Celebrating the story of freedom

She is in her early to mid-20s now. She may be in university; she may still be in the army. She may be working; she may be unemployed. She may be married; she may be single. But she is in Israel, an Israeli, free from the sufferings and the terrors that afflicted her family in Ethiopia; free to try to make her life the most that it can be.

The photo captures a moment 18 years ago. The beautiful young girl, smiling so purely, so entirely without guile, that we cannot help but smile back, has just arrived in Israel. She was one of 14,000 Jews who were secretly brought to the Jewish state in May 1991 in a legendary rescue mission that lasted barely more than 36 hours.

The mission was called Operation Solomon after the king whose descendants the Beta Yisrael, the Jews of Ethiopia, were said to be. It will be remembered as one of the most dramatic acts of selflessness and courage on the part of a nation state in the modern era.

The young girl's photo appears on this page because her story – the story of her freedom – is tied so entirely to the story of Pesach. The 18th anniversary of that story, therefore, must also be recalled around the seder table this year.

Editorial

In addition, recalling the quiet heroics of Operation Solomon is both potent and poignant refutation of the brazenly false accusation that Israel is an apartheid state. This refutation also appears elsewhere in this issue of The CJN. It has appeared in the paper in the past. And it will appear countless times in the future, too.

The CJN believes very strongly in fighting back against the lies blatantly cast at the Jewish state, indeed cast at Jews everywhere, and in particular, against this most detestable of lies, the apartheid lie.

Operation Solomon was carried out ahead of the moment-to-moment advance by rebel military forces on the capital of Addis Ababa. Israel had paid $40 million to then-president Mengistu Haile Mariam to secure the freedom of the Jews seeking desperately to escape to Israel. But the rapid advance of the rebels placed the Jews and their Israeli rescuers in harm's way.

Israel had to move quickly.

The operation began on Friday, May 24, 1991.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Network Lobbies CJC

TORONTO — Al-Jazeera is lobbying Canadian Jewish Congress in its bid for regulatory approval to hit the airwaves. Tony Burman, a former CBC executive who is managing director of Al-Jazeera English, met last week with CJC representatives to reassure them that Al-Jazeera's two-year-old English service is independent from the controversial Arabic service. In 2003, the CJC and B'nai Brith Canada opposed Al-Jazeera's application for a broadcast license, saying the Qatar-based network broadcasts anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial, and glorified suicide bombers. They said the network's Arabic service would violate anti-hate laws. In 2004, the CRTC approved carriage of the Arabic service but imposed restrictions that made airing it difficult. Cable and satellite providers were ordered to "alter or delete" programming to ensure that no "abusive comment" would air. CJC is "struggling with" the English service's approval, CEO Bernie Farber told the Toronto Star. "We recognize the need for free speech to be paramount and the right of broadcasters to ensure they can reach audiences" but "there's no walking away from some of the disgusting, anti-Semitic, Jew-hating broadcasts [Al-Jazeera has] engaged in," Farber said

CIE Gets U.S. Grant

TORONTO — The Canada Israel Experience has received a $150,000 grant from the U.S.-based Covenant Foundation to help train leaders of Birthright Israel trips and develop programming for Birthright alumni, the CIE announced last week. CIE, a division of UI Federations Canada, is Canada's largest provider of Birthright Israel trips, which sends young adults ages 18 to 26 on free, first-time trips to Israel. The grant, to be paid over three years, will help train trip leaders in public speaking and group facilitation, and help trip alumni plan community projects.

WORLD

No Ties, Chavez Vows

DOHA — Venezuela's president said he has no plans to resume ties with Israel in the wake of its military incursion in Gaza. Hugo Chavez told Al-Jazeera March 29 that he would not consider resuming diplomatic relations until Israel reconsiders its "genocidal attitude." Chavez also reaffirmed his close relationship with Iran. He expelled the Israeli delegation in January to protest Israel's Gaza operation.

Wiesel Collects Funds

LOS ANGELES — An e-mail campaign to help Elie Wiesel's foundation in the wake of the Bernard Madoff scandal has raised $400,000. Wiesel, the Nobel Prize-winning author, lost more than $7 million of his own fortune, and his foundation took a $15.2-million hit in the Ponzi scheme. In recent months, small and large donations totalling $400,000 have flowed into the Wiesel Foundation for Humanity, which funds after-school centres in Israel, conferences and humanitarian awards, the Conde Nast Portfolio business magazine's website said. Some of the money went directly to Wiesel and his wife, Marion, but the couple gave everything to the foundation.

Suspect in Paris Shul Bombing Gets Bail

OTTAWA — A Canadian-Lebanese man suspected of bombing a Paris synagogue in 1980 has been freed from jail on $290,000 bail but will be confined to strict house arrest, an Ottawa court ruled last week.

Hassan Diab, 55, was freed from prison March 31 and will remain under house arrest for several months, living with his common-law wife, until judges decide whether he must be extradited to France for his suspected role in planning a terror attack against the Copernic Street synagogue in Paris. Four people were killed in that bombing.

Prosecutors said Diab might try to escape while under house arrest, despite the court's ruling that he wear an electronic tracking bracelet and report weekly to police.

French police told reporters they have evidence that Diab, a former pro-Palestinian activist, is responsible for the attack, and they requested his extradition in order to try him in in Paris, Associated Press reported.

Diab was arrested in November in Ottawa at the request of French police. At the time he had been working part-time as a professor at Carleton University.

The October 1980 bombing of the Copernic Street synagogue occurred during Sabbath evening prayers, when it was packed with more than 300 people.

Pro-Israel ralliers buy wine to stymie boycott

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A boycott against Israeli wine organized by Not In Our Name: Jewish Voices Opposing Zionism backfired on Sunday when hundreds of consumers staged a counter-boycott and bought up the Summerhill LCBO's entire stock of Israeli wine in a matter of hours.

The protest, dubbed "Apartheid is Not Kosher," was scheduled to take place at the Summerhill LCBO, at 10 Scrivener Square, between 1 and 3 p.m.

Not In Our Name, an affiliate member of Independent Jewish Voices, had planned to picket in front of the store to distribute information about the Palestinian cause and "Israeli apartheid."

They asked that Jews buying kosher for Passover wine "make [their] Passover apartheid-free" by boycotting Israeli wine brands such as Dalton, Margalit, Barkan, Carmel and Gush Etzion, and instead purchase kosher wines from Canada, Chile, Australia, the United States, Italy, Argentina, France, New Zealand and South Africa.

The group also urged people to contact their local LCBO to "tell them you don't support Israeli apartheid and they shouldn't either."

Don Carr, The CJN's president, who went to the demonstration to support the counter-boycott, said that "a forlorn little group of about a dozen protesters stood meekly on the sidewalk on Yonge Street, north of the store. Some carried signs urging the boycott. However, they were swallowed up by the hundreds and hundreds of Jewish purchasers."

Carr said that he learned about the boycott late last month from a member of the Jewish Defence League. He and his wife, Judy Feld Carr, decided to send an e-mail to everyone on their e-mail list, – which included addresses of those who work with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress and others involved in the Toronto Jewish community – to urge them

Not taking it anymore!

From the editor's desk...

The defining moment in the 1976 movie Network, the stinging satire about the nature of network television and its influence on passive, TV-centric, North American society is when news anchor Howard Beale (played by Peter Finch) reaches the end of his emotional tether and with a soul-searing cry straight from his heart, shouts into the television camera: "I'm as mad as hell, and I'm not going to take this anymore!"

Angered by the deteriorating state of the world around him and, more particularly, by his own apparent inability to positively affect his world, he finally explodes in rage. And he urges his viewers to do the same. He urges them to go a window, open it, stick their heads out and shout out loud: "I'm as mad as hell, and I'm not going to take this anymore!" And many do.

Undoubtedly, many supporters of Israel these days feel as angry and as outraged as Howard did.

We are outraged by the constant lies, distortions and the perversions of the truth that are the common parlance of Israel's enemies and their often unwitting anti-Israel confederates in the West.

The biggest of all the lies, of course, is the apartheid indictment. It is so utterly inapt that it is absurd. It has become the rallying cry for hard-core leftists, hard-core anti-Zionists and plain anti-Semites. Despite the absurdity of the accusation, it carries with it the potential for grave danger to the Jewish state, because of the specific precedent set by the dismantling of the only apartheid regime that ever did exist.

Thus when anti-Israel protesters hurl the apartheid calumny at the Jewish state, they are also calling for the dismantling of the Israeli regime.

In their minds, there is room for not even one Jewish state on this Earth.

For those of us who believe the contrary – that there must and always will be a Jewish state on Earth – the apartheid accusation is transparent code for bringing an end to the State of Israel.

Thus, when we hear these deliberate misrepresentations, we feel like Howard: "We are as mad as hell, and we are not going to take this anymore."

Though we may occasionally shout out our rage literally and metaphorically, rarely do we act upon our rage.

This past weekend, however, in Toronto, a large, determined group of Israel supporters did act. They were "as mad as hell," and they did something about it. They stymied yet another odious effort by the anti-Israel cadre at propagating the big lie against the Jewish state. In the result, they also did something tangibly positive for Israel and for their own sense of dignity and purpose.

Two anti-Israel groups, Coalition Against Israel Apartheid and Not in My Name, had planned a demonstration outside the Summerhill LCBO store in Toronto last Sunday. They intended to urge prospective customers to boycott the purchase of Israeli wine.

When they heard earlier in the week of the planned demonstration by the "apartheidists," longtime community activists Judy Feld Carr and Don Carr (the president of The CJN) sent e-mails to friends and others alerting them of the Sunday protest and urging a pragmatic "counter-protest," namely the deliberate purchase of Israeli wines for the upcoming Passover holiday.

The Internet quickly converted the e-mail transmission to a small group into a clarion call to an entire community. As a result of the e-mails, "there was a gigantic turnout of members of the community" at the liquor store last Sunday, Feld Carr said.

"They flocked in, jammed the store and the two locations inside where Israeli wine was on sale were mobbed," Don Carr wrote in an e-mail to The CJN.

To prepare for the anticipated heavy demand for Israeli wines, the manager of the store brought in as much stock as possible. After 45 minutes, the store sold out of their significant supply of kosher Israeli wine. But the "as-mad-as-hell" pro-Israel supporters still kept arriving to show their solidarity with the Jewish state.

"Many people came with large Israeli flags and signs, urging the purchase of Israeli products and decrying the attempted boycott," Carr said.

At one marvellous point in the afternoon, the famed Jewish motorcycle club Yidden on Wheels arrived, honking horns, each biker carrying a huge Israeli flag. Some even put on their tfillin.

A Chabad truck, emblazoned with Happy Passover signs, was there also, loudspeakers blaring. People came to the midtown liquor store from as far away as Thornhill and Richmond Hill. There were hundreds upon hundreds.

"The crowd was in a really festive mood in the bright sunlight," Carr said, "wishing one another 'Chag Samayach' and showing the pleasure they had in doing something quite worthwhile, something very tangible for Israel: buying the wine that they needed for Passover."

What transpired at the Summerhill liquor store last Sunday was described as a "Jewish happening." It was also a Jewish awakening.

Those supporters of Israel determined they "were not going to take it anymore." Mad as hell at the lies emanating from the other side of the street, they refused merely to be passive in the face of the grinding hollering from the anti-Israel crowd.

Satisfied that at least on that one day they were able to stand up for the truth, they went home to prepare for the holiday of freedom and to celebrate their own.

Anti-Semitic incidents reach record highs

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The number of anti-Semitic incidents surged across Canada in 2008, continuing a trend that began in 2002, data released by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada showed last week.

Altogether, 1,135 occurrences were reported by the League in 2008, an increase of 8.9 per cent over the year before.

"This increase is not an aberration, but the continuation of a growing trend of anti-Jewish prejudice and bigotry on the Canadian scene that speaks both to the pure resilience of anti-Semitism and to the fact that multiculturalism, whether in policy or in practice, does not, in itself, guarantee tolerance and respect," the League stated in its 2008 Audit of Antisemitic Incidents.

Audit released by League for Human Rights

The steep growth in occurrences, which eclipsed those found in Australia and the United Kingdom, reflects "growing tensions in society relating to the current economic downturn," the audit suggested.

"Indeed, in the absence of the type of significant Middle East triggers that traditionally spark spikes in anti-Semitic incidents, the fact that 547 incidents, close to half the total in Canada overall, took place in the last four months of 2008, can indeed be linked to fallout from the developing economic recession and such high profile fiascos as the Bernard Madoff scandal. Historically, anti-Semitism has increased in this type of olimate, as disgruntled citizens seek a scapegoat to blame for their personal difficulties," the report stated.

The audit has been released annually for 27 years and is based on information gathered by B'nai Brith's offices across Canada.

The audit attributed 211 incidents in 2008 to tensions in the Middle East, while noting that anti-Israel incidents were not included in the tally unless they contained an overtly anti-Jewish element. As a result, the findings "give an incomplete picture of the totality of the prejudice that currently targets the Jewish community. This new bigotry often masquerades as anti-Zionism."

In a news release, Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith, said "the overall findings for 2008 demonstrate that anti-Semitism has weaved its way into all facets of Canadian society, tainting the workplace and educational facilities and targeting places of worship and private homes. Failing to act now and hiding instead under the cloak of multiculturalism will set Canada on a path along which so many other countries are currently being propelled, one that sees hatreds such as anti-Semitism turn ever more vicious and violent."

Despite the audit's cautionary message, violent incidents formed only a tiny proportion of the overall number of reported occurrences. Of the 1,135 incidents reported, only 14, or 1.2 per cent, were categorized as violent, and of that number, half were reported in the Greater Toronto Area.

Eight hundred and three incidents were labelled as "harassment" (such as threatening calls and e-mails) and 318 were "vandalism" (such as grafitti).

One of the incidents of violence occurred "where a young man was assaulted in a face-to-face encounter on a public street in rural Quebec while on vacation," while one example of harassment and vandalism cited in the study was a synagogue in Edmonton being defaced and its windows smashed.

A unique, historic echoing

Israel Air Force historian Arié Egozi recorded that "the group, headed by deputy chief of staff Gen. Amnon Shahak, set up a command post in the [Addis Ababa] airport, while Israeli special forces and paratroops secured the runway and airfield perimeter. An Israeli mobile air traffic control unit performed advisory control, parallel to that given by the airport's tower.

"Some of the flights were performed by a specially configured El Al 747, carrying 1,200 passengers," he wrote.

"By noon on May 24, the preparations were complete and the green light was given for the first aircraft to land. In the next 24 hours, 18 air force C-130s and eight Boeing 707s, aided by nine El Al aircraft – three 747s, four 767s and two 757s – flew 14,000 Jews from Addis Ababa to Tel Aviv's Ben-Gurion Airport. All of the El Al aircraft had their logos covered."

So practised and precise were the Israeli rescue preparations that the 747 was on the ground at Addis Ababa for only 37 minutes before leaving with its precious cargo of 1,200 passengers.

Within 36 hours, 14,000 Jews had boarded El Al planes and landed in Israel in a non-stop, round-the-clock operation of daring, courage and compassion.

One can only imagine the excitement, tension, confusion, weariness, relief and worry that infused the crowded chambers of the revamped airplanes during that night and subsequent day.

In quite a unique and an historic echoing of the sounds and emotions through time, the feelings felt by the Jews who left Ethiopia in 1991 likely replicated many aspects of the feelings felt by the Jews who left Egypt some 3,500 years earlier.

They were going to a land none of them had ever seen before except, if at all, in their dreams of the stories remembered, sheltered, told and retold in every generation by their ancestors.

Ironically, but not surprisingly, the story of the Exodus from Egypt would itself become the most famous and most influential paradigm of the story of freedom in western civilization.

The very particularist narrative of our ancient forebears, the freedom of the Hebrews slaves, would eventually bear a widely universal message for all humanity to cherish.

We celebrate that narrative tonight by recalling it in the manner prescribed by our sages, by teaching it to our children, so that they in their turn one day will teach it to theirs.

The young girl whose photo appears on page 1 of the paper may by now be married with a family of her own. If she is, then she most likely will teach the story of her own exodus to her children even as she reaches further back in the collective memory to teach the story of the Exodus of Pesach.

They are both the stories of the Jewish people, purposefully, so that we might have the courage to answer false accusers and the conviction to stand fast to freedom's heavenly arching function: making the world a better place for us all.

25 years ago in The CJN

Some 5,000 people demonstrated in Oberaula, West Germany, against a reunion of veterans of the SS Totenkopf (Death's Head) division. The unit was known for its vicious history of slaughtering Jews and others during World War II.

THE ANGEL OF DEATH PASSED OVER OUR HOMES!?
YES.
SO WHY ARE WE ALL NOW TRUDGING THROUGH THIS DESERT, LOST AND CONFUSED?!
BECAUSE THE ANGEL OF ECONOMIC DISASTER JUST SMOTE US HARD!!
OH.
IF IT ISN'T ONE THING, IT'S ANOTHER!

Galloway's freedom of speech not impeded

Letter writer Stephen Scheinberg is correct in his assertion that free speech is precious, but he debases the commodity by stretching it to fit the bulky frame of George Galloway ("Free speech is a precious commodity," CJN letters, April 2).

Galloway was denied entry to Canada because of his record of providing financial support to Hamas, which was deemed by the government of Canada to be a terrorist organization. Indeed a cursory search of Google and YouTube will provide much evidence that Galloway provided, by his own admission, close to $45,000 in hard cold cash to Ismail Haniyeh, the leader of Hamas – cash to potentially purchase more rockets and mortar to be used against innocent Israeli civilians.

UNCLE BERNIE STARTS THE SAME FIGHT EVERY PESACH...
...THE HAGGADAH SAYS RECLINE TO THE LEFT, HE RECLINES TO THE RIGHT YELLING "THE LEFT HATES ISRAEL!"

Clearly the decision to bar Galloway from Canada was well within the bounds of the Canadian Border Security Agency. Galloway does not have the right of entry, he does not have the right to ministerial intervention and the fact that he is an elected member of Parliament in the United Kingdom does not give him a pass to finance terrorism. He does have the right to bellow about how he has been abused, but let us be clear: in an era where borders have become increasingly permeable to technology, Galloway's freedom of speech was hardly impeded. What was denied to him was the opportunity to raise funds for terrorist organizations.

Galloway ban will backfire

I fear that the Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada are doing the Jewish community a great disservice by strongly supporting the ban of George Galloway from Canada. U.S. Justice Louis Brandeis praised America's founders for knowing that "fear breeds repression; that repression breeds hate; that hate menaces stable government; that the path of safety lies in the opportunity to discuss freely supposed grievances and proposed remedies; and that the fitting remedy for evil counsels is good ones."

Even though I think the views of Galloway are odious, banning him from speaking will backfire. We are better served by fighting his "evil counsels" with "good ones."

Reprieve from acrimonious dialogue

A very important, and pointed, debate is currently underway within Hamilton's Jewish community about the Hamilton Jewish Arab Muslim Dialogue, the grassroots initiative that sought to open lines of engagement between different groups in our city ("Hamilton dialogue collapses," CJN, March 5).

I know the individuals on both sides of this conversation, and I know their views to be honestly held. I have been closely associated with various anti-racism and community-building initiatives in Hamilton. I think it would be a mistake to judge the value of the dialogue by the tenor of its final days. It may not have been a perfect vehicle for community engagement, but then few perfect vehicles exist.

What is equally true, and more telling, is that during its lifetime, the group successfully engaged disparate communities in ways they have not previously engaged. I was party to that engagement, and I can only tell you that it provided an encouraging, even inspiring, reprieve from what has sometimes been an acrimonious and rhetoric-fuelled dialogue.

Passover greetings from Michael Ignatieff

On behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada and our Parliamentary caucus, I would like to extend my warmest wishes to all Canadians celebrating Passover, one of the most important Jewish festivals of the year.

Passover commemorates the Exodus of the Israelites from Egypt and their freedom from the reign of the Egyptian Pharaoh. It is a time when families come together at the seder table to retell the story of Passover and renew its message of hope, faith and liberation.

Let the message of Passover inspire all Canadians, regardless of faith, to cherish the principles of tolerance and goodwill. From my family to yours, Chag Samayach.

Michael Ignatieff
Leader of the Opposition

Netanyahu continues balancing act as he takes office

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

The warnings from Israeli pundits and foreign observers alike came almost as soon as Israeli President Shimon Peres had picked Likud's Benjamin Netanyahu to form the next Israeli government.

The message was clear: don't forsake the pursuit of Arab-Israeli peace and risk isolating Israel on the world stage.

So when Netanyahu addressed the Knesset at his swearing-in ceremony last week, observers were listening closely for signs of where the new prime minister intends to lead his country.

"Israel always, and today more than ever, strives to reach full peace with the entire Arab and Muslim world," Netanyahu said. "We do not want to rule the Palestinians."

At the same time, however, Netanyahu carefully avoided any endorsement of a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The challenges facing Netanyahu's new government are clear, if formidable – steward Israel through a crippling global economic crisis; prevent Iran from going nuclear; contain threats to Israel from Hamas along its southern border and from Hezbollah along its northern border.

But as with his statements over the past few months, Netanyahu's careful articulations in his inaugural address left uncertain where he stands on the most contentious issue in Israel, and between Israel and governments overseas, the pursuit of a two-state peace deal with the Palestinians.

Even talmudic scrutiny cannot fully elucidate Netanyahu's ambiguity on this point.

"Under the permanent-status agreement, the Palestinians will have all the authority necessary to rule themselves," Netanyahu said, at once suggesting that he will pursue Israeli-Palestinian peace but indicating through omission that statehood for Palestinians might not be the end result.

A later line – "I say to the Palestinian leadership that if you really want peace, we can achieve peace" – gives the impression that Netanyahu is willing to make peace, but also leaves the door open for the prime minister to sidestep final-status negotiations if he deems the Palestinian leadership not ready for peace.

Ron Dermer, a senior adviser to Netanyahu who told JTA he will be the new government's director of communications and policy planning, said Netanyahu's position vis-a-vis the Palestinians is not so different from that of Israel's allies.

"The Palestinians should have all the powers necessary for self-governance, but not the handful of powers that could endanger Israel's security," Dermer said, such as an army, airspace rights, heavy weaponry or treaties with states like Iran. Whether or not such an entity is called a state is an issue of terminology, not ideology, he said.

Now that he has taken office, Netanyahu may not be able to keep up his balancing act – offering nuggets to placate critics on the left and right – for long. But doing so may be crucial to keeping his coalition intact.

Even before the February election, Netanyahu made clear he wanted as broad a coalition as possible if he won. But his refusal to support a two-state solution or agree to a power-sharing deal with Kadima's Tzipi Livni cost him the support of Israel's largest political party in coalition negotiations.

For a while, it appeared that Netanyahu's only allies were on the right – enough to form a government and become prime minister, but not enough to keep him safe from a no-confidence vote if he were interested in substantive progress in Israeli-Palestinian negotiations. And a narrow, right-wing coalition certainly would not have won Israel much favour overseas.

But when Netanyahu succeeded last week in bringing the centre-left Labor party into his camp and promised to be a "partner for peace," his government became more palatable to left-wingers in Israel and to allies abroad. Others, however, blasted Labor for providing what they described as a fig leaf for a right-wing Netanyahu agenda.

Netanyahu has yet to publicly endorse a two-state solution to the Israel-Palestinian conflict, putting him somewhere to the right of both Ariel Sharon and George W. Bush. The new foreign minister, Avigdor Lieberman, wants to redraw Israel's borders to exclude Israeli-Arab population centres and require loyalty oaths to the Jewish state in a bid to limit the voting power of Israeli Arabs. And the Orthodox Shas party, which holds 11 seats in the coalition, has promised to withdraw from any government that includes Jerusalem in negotiations with the Palestinians.

At the same time, both Lieberman and Shas have voiced support for land-for-peace swaps with the Palestinians.

In Europe, leaders say there is no room for ambiguity on the issue of a Palestinian state.

"Let me say very clearly that the way the European Union will relate with a government that is not committed to the two-state solution will be very, very different," EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana warned in mid-March.

Given Netanyahu's history and the composition of his government, the onus is on the new prime minister to demonstrate to skeptics abroad that his new government – comprised of Likud, Yisrael Beiteinu, Labor, Shas and the religious Zionist Jewish Home party – will not shift course away from the pro-negotiation policies of Israel's last government or adopt positions that will alienate Israel's allies in Washington and Europe.

"On substance, there is not a big gap between Netanyahu's position and the international community's position, certainly not those that are friends of Israel," Dermer insists.

When it comes to President Barack Obama, veteran Israeli political commentator Nahum Barnea wrote in the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot, there are two questions: "whether Obama will be able to subject his agenda to Israel's, and whether Netanyahu will be willing to accommodate the American president on a series of issues topped by the negotiations on the establishment of a Palestinian state. Netanyahu will be able to draw out the negotiations; it is uncertain whether he will be able to fool his rightist partners.

"It is not exactly the government that the voters of Kadima, Likud, Labor or Shas dreamed of, but it is a legitimate government," Barnea wrote. "It must be given a chance."

Freedom through community

I was never much of an "organization woman." I didn't join groups and organizations. I was shy and a loner. But living requires forming links with others, and as I developed, I found it necessary to join forces with different people and organizations. That is a necessary and beneficial fact of social life. Inevitably, as we live in a community, that community requires distinct forms of support from both individuals and groups. And it's been my privilege to be part of some wonderful groups.

This fact of socialization is subtly highlighted in the story of Passover. As the slaves are released from Egypt and their servitude ends, they are not yet truly liberated. First they must reach Sinai to receive the Ten Commandments, the beginning of the process of receiving the Torah. But that moment of Revelation is not the complete moment of Redemption. As the story goes, it takes 40 years for them to reach the land of Israel, the sign and expression of their true independence and freedom.

Why 40 years?

The colorful narrative tells of the slaves inability to wait at Sinai. They're a rag-tag group, and their coalition is not yet stable enough to withstand the absence of a visible leader, so they create an idol, a golden image. They need constant direction and supervision. They need their "hands held." Being neither a strong family nor fully formed tribes, they then require 40 years to develop a thriving community. Even after entering the Land of Israel, it takes time for the various tribes to constitute the kind of confederation that will yield a nation.

We should not take the formation of community for granted. It's an essential part of our liberation story. Without community, we achieve nothing. Read the Haggadah carefully for its gems about the importance of communal systems: feed the poor, invite all, educate all, ask questions, sit around a table together, join together, keep culture alive, remember, sing folk songs, enjoy. All require strong organizational infrastructures.

All these elements seem to converge together to remind us that true redemption cannot be achieved by individuals nor families alone. Community is needed, with all its warts and imperfections. We can't survive, much less rescue others, without it. Today, with the economy in trouble, our community is our main resource. Yes governments will attempt bailouts, but many will rely on community for help. Our task is to hold fast, so that our community and its organizations will be able to redeem. Support your community, join an organization. Then we shall be free.

This year, let's remember Harry Bingham

For generations at Purim, many Jews have chosen a personal or communal rescue – times when destruction threatened and was averted – that they would remember as part of their own special celebration of the holiday.

But why not choose Passover as a time to celebrate this rescue? After all, Passover is a celebration of the liberation of an entire nation. What better symbol of liberation than the one from oppression and slavery? But no, Purim, with its larger-than-life figures of good and evil, is a much more suitable holiday for this use, I agree.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

It's hard for our children to imagine how our ability to live openly as Jews is so recent. No matter how robust their encounter with anti-Semitism – as on campus these days – they can hardly imagine that in their parents' or grandparents' lifetimes, Canada's Jews were excluded from resorts and whole neighbourhoods, that in Montreal, hospital staff walked out when the first Jewish intern was admitted, or that Canadian universities had quotas on Jewish students.

Much less can they understand how Canada closed its doors to Jews as Hitler began his program of destruction. Thank goodness we have Irving Abella and Harold Troper's None Is Too Many to document that atrocity.

For those being born now, the Holocaust will be as far away as the Exodus from Egypt. They will never meet an actual survivor of that horror, and their experience will be on film or in books (unless they travel to the camps themselves).

Hopefully they will still know the stories of people such as the patrician Harry Bingham.

Prep school and Ivy League-educated, Bingham, like so many of his class, entered the United States Foreign Service. He was posted to Warsaw and then France as war loomed in the late 1930s. He was at the U.S. consulate in Marseilles when Jewish and other refugees began pouring into Vichy France.

The U.S. State Department was as riddled with anti-Semites and xenophobes as Canada's Immigration Department under F.C. Blair. Bingham was instructed to ignore the pleas coming from Jewish refugees and under no circumstances to issue visas or travel papers. Period.

But Bingham broke with his class and employer and began to rescue Jews. The list includes such luminaries as Marc Chagall, Leon Feuchwanger, Max Ernst, Hannah Arendt, as well as many ordinary and equally threatened Jews.

Thus, in direct contradiction to express orders, he issued visas and travel documents. He also urged and facilitated relief efforts in the squalid camps that the Vichy regime had set up to detain Jews and dissidents, although he didn't know, as we know now, that many if not most of those refugees would eventually be deported to the death camps.

Bingham's efforts gained him notoriety at the State Department, and punishment was soon in coming. He was posted in fall 1941 to Argentina just before the United States entered the war. His career was in tatters, and after the war – having been refused a post in Washington that would have involved him in the post-war prosecution of Nazis – he resigned from the foreign service and spent the rest of his life living with his family of 11 children on the family estate.

His story only came to light after his son William discovered documents attesting to his father's heroic efforts. They are now in the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington D.C.. In 1998, he and other diplomats, whose total of rescued Jews exceeded 200,000 people who escaped to freedom, were honoured at Yad Vashem.

You can read about Bingham in the March 2009 issue of the Smithsonian magazine and online at Smithsonian.com/Bingham.

This Pesach there will be many things on our minds: economic crisis, perpetual upheaval in the Middle East, and challenges facing Israel. It may be difficult to clear our psyches in order to properly recite the seder story of liberation.

But knowing that there are always good people where only evil seems to flourish should give us hope.

Canada's Jewish communities

Recently, while presiding over several citizenship court ceremonies, I welcomed new Canadians to what I referred to as our Canadian family.

Although we speak of Canada as if all of us belong to a single homogeneous entity, in reality, Canada is essentially a community of communities. We may be English Canadians or French Canadians. We may celebrate our Aboriginal heritage or our English, Irish or Scottish roots. We may live in central Canada or in the so-called alienated West.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

We may hail from the Atlantic provinces or from the northern territories. We may have been born in Canada, or we may be immigrants or the children of immigrants. We may be professional or skilled workers, or we may be unskilled, struggling or even unemployed. We may be Hindu, Christian, Buddhist, Muslim or Jewish.

Communities may be defined by any number of criteria – language, heritage, ethnicity, geography, politics, economy or religion. Any one person may belong to several communities at the same time.

From a distance, our Jewish population may be viewed as a single entity, but in reality it is also a community of communities. We may reside in a heavily populated area with a large number of people of Jewish background, or we may be more isolated, living in a smaller centre with few other Jews or Jewish resources. We may come from a Sephardi or an Ashkenazi tradition.

We may belong to an Orthodox, chassidic, Conservative or Reform congregation, or we may be part of the approximately 50 per cent of Canadian Jews who remain unaffiliated and are not formally part of any congregation. We may be active in Hadassah-WIZO, Na'amat, B'nai Brith, ORT, Hillel or any of the major Jewish organizations, or we may belong to none.

The organized Jewish community may be described by a variety of acronyms that further subdivide us by our interests. We may read The CJN, the Jewish Tribune or one of the many newsletters in print or online. For our community advocacy, we may rely on the CJC (Canadian Jewish Congress), the official voice of Canadian Jewry, or we may rely on BB (B'nai Brith). Other leading advocacy organizations include CIJA (Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy), CIC (Canada-Israel Committee), CAFI (Canadian Academic Friends of Israel) and NJCL (National Jewish Campus Life).

It should come as no surprise that we do not agree on all matters.

Within our Jewish community, we hold a diversity of views on contemporary social as well as traditional Jewish issues. We have a variety of opinions on social policies ranging from economics and the environment to private health care. We do not always agree on particular strategies to confront and combat anti-Semitism. Although most consider these measures to be vitally important, we may disagree on the value of hate-speech provisions in anti-discrimination legislation and hate propaganda laws in the Criminal Code. We do not all support and practise the principles of egalitarianism within our own religion.

However, despite our differences and divisions, we do share much in common. We have a common history and many common traditions. We share a legacy of hate, repression and victimization. Whether we are survivors or children of survivors, or whether we have no known relatives who perished in the dark days of Nazi oppression, the Holocaust forms an integral part of the Jewish fabric.

We also share certain values and principles arising out of our common religious traditions. These include the imperatives of respect for our fellow human beings, dignity and kindness in the way we relate to others and love for family and community.

I would hope that we all believe in the notion of freedom of religion as well as freedom of expression, so long as they do not endanger the physical and psychological well-being of others. Although we may not agree on every aspect of Israeli policy, I also hope that we all strongly support the viability and security of the State of Israel.

We may not speak with a single voice on all issues, but ultimately, we should celebrate our Jewish diversity and stand together against any threat to our security and vibrancy.

The Kirshner File

Bibi's back

Ten years after retiring from politics and leaving a legacy of polarization and mistrust in his wake, Benjamin (Bibi) Netanyahu is back as Israel's prime minister. He is the fourth Israeli premier to gain a second term, following in the footsteps of David Ben-Gurion, Yitzhak Shamir, Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

And in a curious twist of fate, the ex-general who defeated him in the 1999 election, Ehud Barak, has joined Netanyahu's cabinet as defence minister, despite the fact that Barak promised to go into opposition if his Labor party failed to capture at least 20 Knesset seats. In the Feb. 10 election, Barak's party, once a powerhouse, emerged with a mere 13 seats, its poorest-ever showing.

Netanyahu, who assumed office last week after nearly two months of horse trading with potential coalition partners, tried to persuade Tzipi Livni – the Kadima party leader and outgoing foreign minister – to join his government. He reportedly offered her a full partnership and two of the three top ministerial posts, but she declined, explaining that Netanyahu's refusal to commit to a two-state solution was unacceptable, and declaring that she would not serve as a "fig leaf" for his right-wing agenda.

In justifying his controversial decision to ally himself with Netanyahu, the supremely ambitious Barak said that he would be a "counter-force" rather than a "fifth wheel" in cabinet. For good measure, as if to mollify Labor party members who objected to his alliance with Netanyahu, he added that Netanyahu had assured him that he would continue negotiations with the Palestinians.

Netanyahu, in the days leading up to the formation of his government, portrayed himself as a pragmatist an an attempt to ease both domestic and international concerns that he would freeze the peace process, such as it is.

Keenly aware that Israel's ally, the United States, is strongly in favour of a two-state solution, and that the European Union, Israel's largest trading partner, threatened to reconsider its relationship with Israel unless it supports the creation of a Palestinian state, Netanyahu delivered a series of conciliatory statements designed to allay fears.

In a meeting with George Mitchell, U.S. President Barack Obama's special envoy to the Middle East, he said that he would work toward a peace agreement with the Palestinian Authority and Israel's Arab neighbours, which eluded his predecessor, Ehud Olmert, and honour Israel's international commitments.

The commitments to which Netanyahu may have been referring turn on three points: Israel's acceptance of the "road map" peace plan (about which he had deep reservations from the outset and which, in any event, was never implemented by either side), Israel's yet-to-be-kept promise to evacuate unauthorized outposts and place limits on settlement construction in the West Bank, and Israel's pledge, within the framework of the Annapolis summit, to settle final-status issues in concert with the Palestinian Authority. Judging by some of his earlier comments, Netanyahu has no intention of honouring these commitments.

Rather than signing a comprehensive agreement with the Palestinian Authority, which was Olmert's objective but which he thinks is premature, given the current schism in Palestinian ranks, Netanyahu wants to refocus talks on rebuilding the Palestinian economy – which was shattered by the second intifadah – and thereby improve the lives of ordinary Palestinians.

The mainstream Palestinian leadership, led by Mahmoud Abbas, rejects that narrow approach, as does the Arab League, the European Union and the United States.

Nonetheless, Netanyahu hopes to proceed with this proposal in co-operation with Jordan. As Netanyahu's spokesperson, Dina Libster, said, "Economic peace has to come first."

As well, in accordance with a U.S. master plan, directed by Gen. Keith Dayton, Netanyahu wants to expand the deployment of Palestinian police beyond Hebron, Nablus and Jenin.

Netanyahu claims that he has no interest in governing the Palestinians or blocking their path to nationhood. Yet he will accept nothing less than a demilitarized Palestinian state with limited powers and sovereignty and insist on controlling its borders, airspace, coastline and electromagnetic frequencies.

In his view, a Palestinian state under present conditions would morph into "an Iranian state, as we saw happen in [the Gaza Strip]." Netanyahu – a critic of the Oslo peace process who nevertheless negotiated with Yasser Arafat and agreed to withdraw from most of Hebron – opposed Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza in 2005. He warned that a pullout would embolden Hamas to fire Qassam rockets at Israeli towns, kibbutzim and moshavim near the border. He was right, but the continued occupation of Gaza was neither a sensible nor viable option.

On a related matter, Netanyahu has said that he will not be bound by Olmert's commitment to evacuate settlements in the West Bank. "These understandings are invalid and unimportant," he said this past January. But in common with his predecessors, Netanyahu seeks to retain settlement blocs close to Jerusalem and the coastal plain.

In keeping with the thrust of the "road map," Netanyahu has promised not to build new settlements in the West Bank. But in a direct challenge to the "road map," he has assured Jewish settlers that he will permit their settlements to grow: "I will not choke the settlements."

Netanyahu is a fierce opponent of partitioning Jerusalem so as to accommodate the Palestinian quest to establish their capital in the eastern half of the city. His position flies in the face of the parameters laid down by the United States and the Arab League peace plan.

As he put it in February, "We did not return to Jerusalem after praying for it to be rebuilt for 2,000 years in order to give it up."

He is of the opinion that an Israeli withdrawal from eastern Jerusalem, conquered in the Six Day War, would lead to the formation of an Iranian base there. "Hamas will enter and set up an Iranian-backed terror centre," he said.

To Netanyahu, Hamas is an enemy to whom no quarter can be given. "A government under my leadership will overthrow the Hamas rule in Gaza and bring about a cessation of rocket fire," he said about two months ago, after the recent war in Gaza. "There is no choice but to uproot the Iranian-backed regime in Gaza," added Netanyahu, who argues that Israel's military operation in Gaza stopped too soon, before Hamas was irretrievably weakened and its smuggling tunnels were destroyed.

Despite his focus on the Palestinians, Netanyahu says that Iran is Israel's number one problem, not only because of its budding nuclear program, but because of its regional hegemonic ambitions and alliances with Hamas and Hezbollah.

Speaking to the World Economic Forum in Davos recently, Netanyahu said that if Israel can "neutralize" Iran, the dangers posed by Hamas and Hezbollah will correspondingly decrease. But is Netanyahu ready to confront Iran militarily? Will he be satisfied with tough economic sanctions?

Netanyahu is also hawkish on the Golan Heights, which Israel wrested from Syria in the Six Day War, believing that Israel cannot afford to relinquish it. "The Golan will remain in our hands," he said recently.

Yet as prime minister from 1996 to 1999, he dispatched an envoy to Damascus with instructions to inform the Syrians that he was ready for a compromise pact under which Israel would pull back to the 1923 international line. As expected, Syria rebuffed the overture, demanding a withdrawal to the pre-1967 lines.

Several months ago, the Netanyahu camp launched a trial balloon suggesting that an interim agreement between Israel and Syria, within the context of a partial Israeli withdrawal, is attainable.

Syria, however, is not likely to embrace this proposal. For Syria, it is an all-or-nothing game.

To our investors, it's a happy Passover

This week as we celebrate our freedom from slavery in Egypt, some of us ask: why is the Romspen Fund different from all other investments? Because whether it's good times or bad, investors have never received their monthly distribution at an annualized rate of less than 8.4%.

To our many Jewish customers who are investors in The Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund, we are thankful for your steadfast support and confidence. From Arthur, Mark, Wes, Blake, Shelly and our entire staff, we wish you continued good health and fortune.

Happy Pesach.

Rising levels of tension reported on campuses

In Winnipeg, a boy travelling with his mother on a public bus was threatened and taunted with anti-Semitic slurs, and in Thornhill, Ont. a Russian-language e-mail accused Jews of kidnapping children to use their blood in the baking of Passover matzahs.

The league suggested its findings were consistent with other investigations into hate-motivated incidents. It cited a Statistics Canada study released in 2008 that was based on data compiled in 2006 by Canadian police services. That study found that nearly two-thirds of hate crimes motivated by religion – 63 in all – were aimed at Jews.

In 2008, Toronto police recorded a total of 153 hate-related incidents, 45 of them aimed at Jews, who "were the single most consistently targeted group."

York Regional Police recorded 81 incidents of hate last year, 26 of them against Jews.

The reported suggested university campuses were experiencing rising levels of tension, with 76 incidents of anti-Semitism, up from 36 cases in 2006. "Many students report hiding their Jewish identity and avoiding participation in classroom discussions, in order to avoid negative interactions both in class and subsequently in the corridors, where threats and intimidation are common," the audit stated.

The Internet was a prime area for hate activity, with 405 cases reported, among them "threatening messages."

The audit reviewed the controversy over Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, which makes it a discriminatory act to spread hate on the Internet. It noted that Prof. Richard Moon, reporting to the Canadian Human Rights Commission, recommended scrapping the section. The league, however, recommended reform "in order to more meaningfully and efficiently respond to the needs of the day."

The league also recommended declaring Holocaust denial a form of hate propaganda, prosecutable under the Criminal Code, and it called for the banning of racist groups and their symbols.

"However, it would be necessary to ensure careful screening mechanisms to prevent abuses, such as the malicious targeting of legitimate organizations in frivolous complaints," the audit stated.

Circle of Care seeks hospice volunteers

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Circle of Care needs volunteers for its hospice visiting program, which provides in-home care and support to individuals who face life-threatening illness and to their families and caregivers.

Volunteers provide companionship, relieve caregivers and assist with outings, errands and light shopping.

The Jewish Hospice Program, a partnership of Circle of Care, Jewish Family and Child, Mount Sinai Hospital's Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care, Baycrest and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, provides care for all Jewish residents in the Greater Toronto Area, and the general hospice program is geared to all residents, Jewish and non-Jewish, of the former North York.

Mindy Shiel, hospice volunteer program co-ordinator, said that volunteers, who complete hospice training and receive ongoing supervision, go through an interview process and police check, and must be willing to commit themselves for at least one year.

The 30-hour training program covers such topics as grief and bereavement, body mechanics and ethics, she said. "Volunteers – the agency now has about 50 who served about 90 clients last year – have told me that they feel rewarded, valued and fulfilled from their work," said Shiel, who recruits, interviews, trains and matches volunteers for the program.

With more and more people choosing to remain at home throughout their illness, she said, the agency requires additional volunteers.

Each client has one volunteer who visits once a week for two to four hours, she said. "If the client is all alone, they may put a second volunteer in place if one is available."

Volunteers, who are compassionate, confident, have no issues with death, and can respect clients' rights and decisions, check in regularly with her, she said.

"They're often the ones who inform us if there is a change in the client's status. They develop a relationship with the client and their family, and they've sometimes gone to the funeral and the shivah when the client dies."

She stressed that not all clients are dying. "Some need long-term care. There is no prediction how long the [client/volunteer] relationship will last.

"It is definitely an important program, and it is beneficial for everyone involved."

For information, call Shiel at 416-635-2860.

Israel, Palestinians co-operating on security: Rae

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Mideast peace process is fraught with difficulties and roadblocks, caution and concern, but in one area, there seems to be progress between Israelis and Palestinians, Liberal Party foreign affairs critic Bob Rae said last week.

Joint co-operation on assembling a Palestinian security force for the West Bank seems to be making progress, Rae said after a 10-day visit to the region.

During his visit, which included stops in Israel, the Palestinian territories, Lebanon, Jordan, Syria and Egypt, Rae met with Israel Defence Forces (IDF) officers, who told him co-operation on the security force "is much better than anybody expected."

The IDF and Palestinian security officials meet every day to discuss how security in the Palestinian Authority-controlled area will be managed, Rae said. Based on his discussions with both sides, "there is a willingness and determination to do what needs to be done."

Rae, who has visited Israel numerous times, including once in 1993 as Ontario premier when he led an official delegation, said Canadians are playing a role in training the Palestinian force.

Nine Canadian Forces instructors are helping train the security detachment and that number will rise to 18. The instructors are under the control of Lt.-Gen. Keith Dayton, U.S. security co-ordinator for Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

Rae said he was asked "for Canadian leadership, for Canadian presence, for Canada to play the role of an effective [interlocutor] we have always been in the past."

Bob Rae

During the Israel leg of his trip, Rae met with officials from the Mossad (Israeli intelligence), Foreign Ministry and the IDF. He also met with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's security adviser, as well as with journalists and President Shimon Peres. Canadian Ambassador Jon Allen joined him on his visits.

"The clear message from the Israelis was two-fold: that the situation remains tough with regards to Hamas and Hezbollah," including talks through Egypt for the release of captured Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, Rae said.

"There is also deep concern about Iran and the importance of understanding how critical it is for the future of the region."

At the time of Rae's visit, Netanyahu was still trying to cobble together a workable coalition, and Palestinians Rae spoke with were taking a wait-and-see attitude on the new government.

In addition, talks between Hamas and Fatah, the dominant Palestinian organizations in the West Bank, were ongoing, U.S. Middle East envoy George Mitchell had not yet completed his review and Washington had not yet expounded on its policy for the region. Rae said there appeared to be a "sense of realism" in the region and a desire to engage in dialogue once all the new developments play out. In addition, Palestinians were concerned about the expansion of Israeli settlements.

As for negotiations with Hamas, "the fact is direct talks with Hamas are not in the cards until everybody accepts the clear conditions set out by the Quartet and everybody else," Rae said. The Quartet – the United States, Russia, the United Nations and the European Union – have made talks with Hamas conditional on the terrorist organization agreeing to abide by previous peace agreements, give up violence and recognize Israel.

"In many capitals" outside Israel, he heard concern over Iran and its support of Hezbollah and Hamas.

"It is of deep concern in the region and to moderate opinion everywhere," Rae said. "Of concern in every country is the expansion of extremist Islamic fundamentalism, which poses a challenge to moderates and stability."

He was also told "progress on the Israeli-Palestinian issue will help reduce the appeal of extremism."

Rae said his visit to the region grew out of an invitation to speak at the American University of Beirut. He contacted the Canada-Israel Committee and the Canada Egypt Business Council, who partially financed the trip and arranged meetings in the region.

Rae said his talks in Israel were "cordial, candid and friendly. They always know when they're talking to Canadians, they're talking to friends."

Foreign media open to persuasion, audience told

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Aryeh Green offered a bit of novel advice for observers of the Middle East whose blood may boil when they read reports by western journalists who toe the Palestinian line. Don't get angry with them, he suggested, make friends with them.

Aryeh Green

A variation on the old theme of catching more flies with honey than with vinegar, Green said he has put that approach to work in Israel, where he attempts to cultivate relationships with foreign correspondents and influence their coverage in a way that brings into play the Israeli position on contentious issues.

Green is director of MediaCentral, an offshoot of HonestReporting, which describes itself as a Jerusalem-based media-liaison organization that provides support services for journalists based in or visiting Israel and the Palestinian territories.

Palestinians have been "shmoozing" reporters for years, with some success, Green told an audience at a downtown law offices of Cassels Brock & Blackwell recently. Green and John Thompson, director of the Mackenzie Institute, were guests of the Speakers Action Group and the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association. They spoke on "Israel in the News… a War of Ideas."

MediaCentral helps journalists with information, access to relevant new sources and with materials. Doing so is something of an antidote to the pro-Palestinian line many reporters bring with them to Israel, Green said.

By providing professional services to journalists, MediaCentral can help ensure the reports are more balanced.

"I believe accuracy is Israel's best ally," Green said. "More than that, journalists see themselves as professionals. The majority of the journalists working and reporting in Israel are professionals and doing the best job they can to report from the field. Our goal is to help them achieve their goals."

Still, he conceded, many foreign correspondents in Israel tilt to the Palestinian side and have adopted their perspective. "They are a product of their generation and intellectual milieu that accepts the Palestinian view and that informs their view of the Middle East," he said.

Green, a onetime adviser to former Knesset member and deputy prime minister Natan Sharansky, said the pro-Palestinian perspective can be found in many examples: the description of Israel's security barrier – which is mostly fence – as an "apartheid wall"; or in the labelling of Israeli political leaders such as Benjamin Netanyahu as "hawkish," while Arab leaders like Hosni Mubarak, Mahmoud Abbas and the Saudi leadership are termed "moderates."

Hamas rocket attacks are minimized, with a reporter stating "only 23 Israelis" were killed by them. "Palestinian acts of violence are minimized, while the world media condemns Israel for defensive operations. We should be very concerned by that," he said.

Thompson said the western world is entering a phase of "fourth-generation warfare," which has eclipsed first-generation combat [over territory], second-generation conflict [wars of attrition like World War I] and third-generation war of manoeuvre and psychology [World War II].

"The real objective of fourth-generation warfare is international sympathy," he told The CJN. "Hezbollah in 2006 played for that very successfully, and Israel did not even know that the game had changed."

The most successful practitioners of fourth-generation warfare were the Vietnamese, who lost every battle to U.S. forces but who convinced the American public the war was unwinnable. That led to the withdrawal of U.S. forces, Thompson said.

In Gaza, the media reported on frightened-looking children, "but the people behind them were fine."

Thompson said western countries face an external threat by jihadists and an internal threat from leftists who, like those who saw nothing wrong with Stalin or Hitler, support external enemies.

"As a Scot, Irish Catholic, the defence of my heritage, traditions and culture begins by defending the Jews," he said.

Galloway threatens to sue CJC CEO

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

British MP George Galloway has threatened to sue Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, for allegedly calling him a terrorist.

Galloway told a crowd in Ottawa via an Internet connection, "I have instructed my lawyers in Canada to bring an action for defamation against Bernie Farber… and CTV for comments he made that they allowed him to make," the Ottawa Citizen reported. "I am not a terrorist. I am not a threat to Canada's national security."

Contacted by The CJN, Farber said "there will be no apology." He also noted "the irony that this poster boy for free speech had absolutely no compunction in trying to silence anyone who wants to criticize his work."

The threatened suit was the latest development in a week that saw a Federal Court judge decline to overturn a government decision to bar Galloway from Canada.

Lawyers for the Respect party MP failed to convince Federal Court Judge Luc Martineau to issue an injunction to temporarily set aside a decision by Canadian Border Services Agency (CBSA) that prohibited Galloway from entering the country. Despite that ruling, Galloway addressed an audience of 300 or more at Toronto's Metropolitan United Church via video link from New York. He challenged Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney to "come out and debate me like a man."

Kenney had declined to exercise his ministerial discretion to overrule the CBSA decision, which found Galloway had violated Canadian law by providing funds to Hamas, a designated terrorist organization. Galloway was part of a group of activists that delivered humanitarian aid to Gaza following Israel's recent military operation in the territory. He also presented Hamas with $45,000 in cash.

In a 14-page ruling, Martineau said, "I am not ready to exempt Mr. Galloway from the provisions in the [Immigration and Refugee Protection] Act.

"The admission of a foreign national to this country is a privilege determined by statute, regulation or otherwise and not a matter of right," he wrote.

Galloway supporters argued the ban was a free speech issue in which the government tried to stifle criticism of its Afghanistan and Middle East policies.

Meanwhile, in Quebec City, the provincial Liberal government unanimously rejected a motion by Québec solidaire MNA Amir Khadir asking the Ottawa to change its mind and allow Galloway to enter Canada. The motion was supported by the opposition Parti Québécois, but the government, which has a slight majority, was able to prevent it from coming to the floor. Galloway spoke at Concordia University in November 2006.

Czech consulate marks two historical events

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In a sombre ceremony at the University of Toronto, the Czech Republic recently marked the 70th anniversary of two separate – but ultimately related – events.

On March 14, 1939, the first rescue train of Jewish children, known as the kindertransport, pulled out of Prague, bound for Britain.

One day later, the German army marched into Prague, the Czech capital, transforming a democratic nation into a protectorate of Nazi Germany and dooming its Jewish population.

"We're here to commemorate evil and praise good," a Czech consulate general official said, launching the March 26 evening of remembrance, How We Escaped Hitler, hosted by Prague-born Canadian television personality Hana Gartner.

For the next two hours, these historical events were the subject of an informal discussion by two Czech-born journalists, Peter Newman and Joe Schlesinger, and of an Emmy Award-winning documentary film about the British man who organized the kindertransport, Nicholas Winton.

The meeting was sponsored by the Czech Republic in co-operation with the British consulate in Toronto.

Before it ended, Czech diplomats conferred Order of Tomas Masaryk silver medals – one of the country's highest honours – upon Gartner, Newman and Schlesinger.

Newman, an author and former editor of the Toronto Star and Maclean's magazine, recalled that his father, a wealthy industrialist, cried after his homeland was invaded by Germany.

Newman witnessed the triumphant entry of German troops into Prague, and, looking back, he said quietly, "Czechoslovakia was dying." (In 1993, Czechoslovakia peacefully split into the Czech and Slovak republics).

"It was a surrender," said Newman, whose family was permitted to immigrate to Canada as barley farmers, but only in the guise of Catholics.

"The Munich Pact took away our defences," he said in a reference to the infamous agreement that enabled Germany to grab some of Czechoslovakia's territory. "We had only 20 years of freedom, from 1918 to 1938."

Newman speculated that the Czech army could have inflicted horrendous casualties on the German army had it chosen to challenge Germany's invasion.

Peter Newman

Joe Schlesinger

Schlesinger, a retired CBC TV foreign correspondent and one of the 669 Jewish children saved by Winton, described Czechoslovakia as a bastion of democracy, multiculturalism and tolerance before it was swallowed up by Germany.

His parents, having signed him up for the kindertransport, thought he would be back soon.

Their assumption seemed reasonable.

"In Jewish history, there were good periods and bad periods," noted Schlesinger, whose dusky voice accompanied hundreds of first-hand reports from areas of conflict.

For decades, Schlesinger had no idea that his guardian angel had been Winton, a London stockbroker of Jewish origin whose parents had him baptized when he was a child.

All in all, Winton, a humanitarian in the finest sense of the word, organized eight transports from Prague to London and arranged for British foster families to care for the children.

Winton's ninth transport never reached its destination, having been interrupted by the outbreak of World War II.

For years, Winton kept his exploits secret, not even telling his wife, Greta. But in 1988, the story came to light after she found a scrapbook of his activities in their attic.

Winton, nominated for the 2008 Nobel Peace Prize by the Czech government, will celebrate his 100th birthday on May 19.

Matej Minac's film about him, Nicholas Winton: The Power of Good, narrated by Schlesinger, was screened after Newman and Schlesinger finished their recollections.

The program was augmented by Yuri Dojc's photographic exhibition, What Remained, about the Jewish past in the Slovak Republic.

David Frum voices concerns about Obama

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

U.S. President Barack Obama has given speeches supporting Israel and denounced Iran's quest for nuclear weapons, but he may try to pressure the Jewish state to make concessions that could harm its interests, conservative political analyst and former Bush White House insider David Frum says.

In a speech titled "A Frightening Question: The Obama Administration and the Security of Israel," given March 26 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, Frum, an author, columnist and former economic speech writer and special assistant to former U.S. president George W. Bush, laid out what he described as positives and "concerns" about the new president.

More than 400 people attended the 15th annual Dr. Joseph Weil Memorial Lecture, a fundraiser for the Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital, the only hospital serving the 300,000 residents in the Netanya area.

In his opening remarks, the Toronto-born Frum, who now lives in Washington, D.C., noted that it was a special evening for him to be back in Toronto, as it was the yahrzeit of his mother, prominent CBC journalist Barbara Frum, who died 17 years ago.

On the one hand, he described Obama as a man of remarkable gifts and spoke of the truly epic story surrounding his election. But he noted that although he has read Obama's books, he said Obama revealed very little about himself in them.

Also on the positive side, Frum noted that in the past, Obama has given many speeches in support of Israel, and that he has said that it's unacceptable for Iran to have nuclear weapons. As well, Obama had many Jewish friends and supporters in Chicago when he was the junior senator from Illinois, and he noted officials in Obama's new administration who have supported the State of Israel in the past.

But Frum also outlined his concerns about the president, including Obama's attempt to appoint Charles Freeman to the national intelligence service. Frum said Freeman has an intense dislike of Israel and took $2 million from Saudi Arabia.

He added that when Freeman's appointment fell apart and Freeman withdrew his nomination, he blamed his defeat on the Israeli lobby.

Frum commended Obama for his recent address to the people of Iran on an important pre-Islamic holiday, adding that Persians and Jews historically had a close connection.

But he criticized Obama for addressing his message to the "Islamic Republic of Iran" rather than the "Republic of Iran." This, Frum said, validates and is an acceptance of the legitimacy of the current Iranian regime.

He added that it's important for a democratic state to reach out to non-democratic states, and that it's preferable to accept Iran with atomic power than to use force.

Turning to Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations, Frum said the issue is difficult but not complex – Palestinian Arabs need only accept Israel.

Citing his own political background, Frum said it's impossible to put pressure on the Arabs, who generally won't budge from set positions, while it's easier to put pressure on Israel, which has shown that it will give way.

Frum expressed fear that Obama may attempt to find a unity between the parties that doesn't exist.

He answered a number of questions from the audience, citing his knowledge of the internal workings of U.S. politics. He cautioned that many times, reasons for decisions don't become public.

David Frum

Responding to a question about Israel's poor public relations, he agreed that it is "awful." Israelis are direct and they let you know what they think, Frum said, adding that Israelis must learn to be more creative. Nevertheless, he said he noticed improvement in Israel's PR during the Gaza war, versus its PR for the 2006 war in Lebanon.

Frum also said it's still too early to say definitively how the Obama administration will approach Palestinian-Israeli negotiations and other looming problems.

Conservative group to fund Melton school

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues (CCCS) – a group started last year as an alternative to the established Conservative umbrella group – has voted to take on the bulk of the funding of the Florence Melton Adult Mini-School in Toronto for the 2009-2010 year.

The Mini-School, a project of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem that's geared to promoting Jewish literacy, has been operating in Toronto for eight years.

It has been mostly funded privately, aside from the first two years, when UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (which became the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education, known as the Mercaz) provided $15,000 a year.

Several synagogues have also provided funding, according to Loretta Tanenbaum, who is both director of the Melton Mini-School in Toronto and executive director of the CCCS.

The program's annual budget depends on a variety of factors including enrolment, number of classes and cost of materials, Tanenbaum said.

Last year, 60 students were enrolled in the program in Toronto. According to the program's website, there are 62 mini-schools in 60 cities throughout the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom and Australia.

Aside from Toronto, other Canadian cities that offer the program are Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg and London. The latter program is a satellite of Toronto's, and Tanenbaum serves as its consultant. Programs in Ottawa and Montreal have closed down within the last few years, Tanenbaum said.

The CCCS was formed last year with four Toronto congregations as constituents – Adath Israel Congregation, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Beth Tzedec Congregation and Beth Sholom Synagogue. Aside from Beth Sholom, which was unaffiliated, the congregations left the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, the umbrella body for about 700 North American shuls, earlier in the year following disagreements over services they received for their membership dollars.

The CCCJ's mandate is "to support community-wide educational initiatives," Tanenbaum said. Supporting the Florence Melton Mini-School, which teaches a gamut of Jewish points of view, "is seen as a trans-denominational way to build community."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

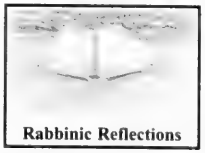
The lesson in breaking the matzah

By RABBI YOSSI MICHALOWICZ

During the early part of the seder, the leader breaks the middle matzah into two parts. He leaves the smaller part on the table between the other two matzot, while hiding the larger part to be eaten later during Tzafun, the 12th step of seder, when we eat the afikoman.

What is the significance of this part of the seder?



The first time something was broken into two parts in the Torah occurred when Jacob divided his camp into two parts prior to his encounter with his brother, Esau. The Torah relates that Jacob said, "If Esau comes to one camp and attacks it, the remaining camp will survive." On a simple level, it appears that Jacob is saying that even if his enemy can destroy one part, he will never be able to destroy the second part.

The chassidic commentaries explain that Jacob was referring to much more than just the physical structure of the Jewish people. Jacob was symbolically referring to the two parts that make up the human being: the physical encampment and the spiritual encampment – the body and the soul.

Jacob's deeper intention was to show that no matter what the worst anti-Semite tries to do, the most he can ever succeed in is harming the physical entity of the Jewish people. But the encampment of our soul can never be taken away from us. So even if Esau comes to one camp – the physical one – and attacks it, the remaining camp – the spiritual one – will survive.

One can read the countless incredible stories of Jewish spiritual defiance, and can't help but be amazed at the fact that as much as the accursed Nazis were able to physically destroy the Jew, they could not destroy the spiritual camp of the Jew. For that reason, seeing Jews singing and dancing while saying the Shema on the way to the gas chambers enraged the Nazis more than anything else.

Therefore, as we start the Magid, the telling of the story of Passover, we break the matzah into two halves, the smaller part symbolizing our body, which we can see, and the larger part symbolizing the soul. We hide the bigger part to show that, even though we cannot see it and it is hidden from us, it will help us realize that the biggest part of who we are can never be destroyed. And by the end of the seder, at the end of time, it will be revealed in all its glory.

Right now, as we go through history, we begin to wonder if we will survive at all – it is Tzafun – hidden from us. We don't have a way of understanding it, but it is the biggest part.

The smaller part of the matzah is what we say during the recitation of the Haggadah. Yes, we are going to go through all kinds of suffering. But by covering up the bigger part for later, we convey the message that we believe. The greater part of us is hidden. We don't understand where it is and when it will show itself, but it is surely going to come.

The symbolic breaking of the matzah is a huge statement before the recitation of the Haggadah: although we find ourselves in situations where it is sometimes difficult to celebrate freedom, we are performing an act of faith, saying we believe that the greater portion of what we are all about is Tzafun – hidden – and there will come a time when we will eat the dessert.

Rabbi Yossi Michalowicz is the spiritual leader of the Westmount Shul and Learning Centre in Thornhill, Ont.

Tel Aviv turns 100, Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

O Tel Aviv, the metropolis that lives in the shadow of that other city that is capital of the country and home to three monotheistic religions. I mean, how can Tel Aviv compete when even the Talmud plays favourites? "Ten measures of beauty descended to the world; nine were taken by Jerusalem and one by the rest of the world." Kidushin 49b [tinyurl.com/telaviv 06]

Well, this year Tel Aviv is celebrating its 100th birthday, and it's about time that city gets its time in the sun. Here's to the country's economic hub, its cultural capital (and the place I once called home).

Of course, Jerusalem figures prominently throughout the Tanach and our daily prayers. But what about Tel Aviv? Granted, the prophet Jonah boarded a boat in nearby Jaffa in order to avoid blessing the residents of Nineveh. [tinyurl.com/telaviv08] And the rabbis Eliezer, Yehoshua, Elazar ben Azaryah, Akiva and Tarphon famously spent a very, very long seder in Bnei Brak that now borders on Tel Aviv. [tinyurl.com/telaviv10]

But believe it or not, there really is a prayer that mentions Tel Aviv! It was originally composed in 1959 by Rabbi Isser Yehuda Unterman, chief rabbi of Tel Aviv-Yafo, in honour of the city's 50th anniversary, and has been updated for the centennial. "Lord of the Universe… Today, we celebrate the centennial of our city… And lo, the city grows larger and more beautiful, always teeming with people and full of life and motion; the voice of Torah is heard in its gates and the noise of workers in its walls, righteousness and charity in its institutions and great clamour in its marketplaces. … Protect our city and its residents, and your people and land which You have chosen." [tinyurl.com/telaviv 09]

(For the record, Tel Aviv is mentioned in the Tanach in the Book of Ezekiel 3:15. "Then I came to them of the captivity at Tel Aviv…" However, that Tel Aviv was actually a Babylonian city where exiles from the Land of Israel had gathered. [tinyurl.com/telaviv07])

Jump ahead a few millennia and over to the shores of the Mediterranean where the Home Building Society in Palestine decided to build a new neighbourhood on the dunes north of ancient city of Jaffa. They initially called the area, "Ahuzat Bayit" or "homestead," but soon after they were engaged in a lively debate over a permanent name. How do you feel about these contenders: New Yafo, Neve Yafo, Nof Yafo, Aviva, Beauty, Tranquil, Ivria or Herzlyia? Eventually, Tel Aviv ("Hill of Spring") was nominated – its name reminiscent of the title of Theodor Herzl's book Altneuland (Old-New Land in German). In true democratic fashion, Tel Aviv was selected with 20 votes to Neve Yafo's 15. [tinyurl.com/telaviv05]

Although the name Avraham Soskin may not ring a bell, you undoubtedly have marvelled at the work of this photographer. Soskin captured the historic photo of representatives of the 66 families who gathered on the dunes north of Jaffa in 1909 for the "seashell raffle" of plots for the new neighbourhood. [tinyurl.com/telaviv01]

According to an article by Barbara Mann, that photo was actually a carefully staged portrait intended to emphasize the marvel of the undertaking. "There is no sign of the city of Jaffa to the immediate south, nor of the Jewish neighbourhoods of Neveh Tsedek and Neveh Shalom [nor] the extensive Arab agriculture in the form of orchards just to the east. The city is formed – yesh me-ayin [something from nothing] – despite the protest of the lone figure at the top of the photo who, as legend has it, yelled out, "Meshuga'im, eyn kan mayim!" ("You're crazy, there's no water here!")[tinyurl.com/telaviv01]

This new settlement was intended to become a "Hebrew urban centre in a healthy environment, planned according to the rules of esthetics and modern hygiene." [tinyurl.com/telaviv03] Visitors to the city can decide for themselves whether the city fathers and mothers succeeded.

Thankfully, the settlers didn't listen to that fabled voice of sanity. Later this month, descendants of those 66 founding families, along with thousands of descendants of the city's builders, will gather for a commemorative centennial photo on the Tel Aviv beach. All are welcome to join! [tinyurl.com/telaviv01]

Next week, a peek at this year's celebrations.

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Family feuds, especially around money, can get very nasty. Throw in some religious tension, and watch the sparks fly. A nasty court battle is going on in Chicago, where an Illinois court recently invalidated a will. The judge objected to a clause that disinherited any descendant who might marry a non-Jew, as four of the five grandchildren in this particular case did. As quoted in the Chicago Tribune (Aug. 25, 2008), the judge remarked, "Suppose Max Feinberg had reservations about his descendants' marrying a black person. Do we really want courts to enforce the worst bigotry imaginable?" While Jewish law shares the same abhorrence for any form of discrimination, it appears to this writer that the judge has overstepped his boundaries.

Jewish law is divided into three broad categories: "religious" law, the laws of purity and impurity and those of a monetary nature. Whereas religious norms are fixed by the Torah and developed and interpreted by the Sages, monetary law can be quite fluid. While the Torah regulates much of our monetary dealings, in this realm, and this realm only, two consenting adults can agree to circumvent the laws of the Torah. While the Torah requires a paid bailee to make restitution if the object he is watching is stolen, the two parties can agree to exempt one from payment even in the case of negligence. This ability to contract out of monetary law explains why Jewish employers tend to pay workers only every couple of weeks, as opposed to the biblical obligation to pay every day.

It would appear that bequeathing one's assets, they being of a monetary nature, should be left to the discretion of each person. Thus, not only can (and possibly should) one disinherit a child who turns his back on his people, a person may choose to give their money only to those who actually intermarry. While morally objectionable, it is perfectly legal.

However Jewish law considers the disposition of an estate not just as a matter of monetary law, but rather of religious law. A dead person no longer controls his money – you truly can't take it with you – and thus it's Torah law and not the deceased's wishes that must reign supreme.

From the perspective of the Torah, the male (father or husband) is obligated to support the female (daughter or wife). There is no obligation for a wife to work to help pay for the family expenses – that is the responsibility of the husband, and the prerogative of the wife. The initial liens against an estate are to provide for single daughters until they marry. Amounts above this basic support level would go to the male children (with an eldest male receiving a double portion).

Such an approach doesn't sit will in our egalitarian age, something our medieval sages understood quite well. They advocated using legal mechanisms, adhering to the letter of the law while circumventing its outcomes, in which the "estate" will be allocated just before death, allowing the daughters a greater share in the inheritance. The use of such legal technicalities allows one to remain faithful to the integrity of Jewish law while ensuring that it is responsive to the needs of the day.

Yet, even if no provisions are made for a proper "halachic will," the children are morally bound to abide by the wishes of the deceased. To see children in court fighting over the estate of their parents brings shame to them and dishonours the memory of the deceased. The ethical example that one demonstrates marks a person's true legacy.

Real Pesach cleaning for Bernie Madoff

Ideas on Identity

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

I know Passover is far from Yom Kippur. It's too early to start thinking about tshuvah, but I can't help it.

All the time that I was cleaning my kitchen – vacuuming the floors personally to be sure there were absolutely no bread crumbs left– I kept thinking about a little tidbit of news I read at the end of March from the U.K. Telegraph. It was about Bernie Madoff, the disgraced financier whose Ponzi scheme destroyed many charities, Jewish organizations and individuals.

The Telegraph headline said: "Bernard Madoff was Obsessed with Cleaning, Recalls Employee." A personal courier who worked for Madoff described how he would come to the office at 7:30 a.m. and often see Madoff "vacuuming the floors, personally… everything had to be clean, even if he had to do it himself."

I'm old enough to remember the Wall Street scandals involving other names– many of whom, unfortunately, were Jews. I suppose that Madoff's name will soon be replaced by some other ignoble person whose greed wins out, and their name may or may not be a Jewish one.

But Madoff hurt so many Jewish institutions – some of which I have personal involvement with, such as Hadassah – along with countless individuals who trusted him, that this time feels different from others, and this one feels different than other fraudsters. So not only do I picture Bernie cleaning his cell, I wonder about the nature of forgiveness for this kind of profound moral downfall.

Elie Weisel reminds us that "forgiveness must be sought." So I would like to suggest that Madoff seek forgiveness by using his talents and passion for cleaning working for minimum wage sweeping up late at night at some burger joint where he can experience what it feels like to live hand to mouth.

The concept of revenge is unnecessary here. Instead, why not require Madoff to live under conditions that might give rise to a real change of heart? What if, instead of spending the rest of his life at the taxpayer's expense in jail, he were required to devote his days to working on behalf of the poor, the homeless and the aged, and live off only the small wage he would earn cleaning up after others. We Jews don't have cloisters where he could spend his days in contemplation and prayer. Instead, perhaps the chametz of his life – the assets he gained by exploiting others – can be seized and distributed to his victims.

In the meantime, he can clean up their homes, vacuuming every one of their floors personally, helping those who need an extra hand koshering their homes for Pesach or delivering boxes of matzah to shut-ins. I can only hope that at the end of many years of doing this that there is no book contract or appearance on Oprah waiting for him, just the sound of a vacuum in a small, simple room, the pictures of every person he cheated, and a schedule of clean-up chores for the week ahead.

Thoughts on Kaddish, nine months in

As Passover arrives, and with it the Yizkor memorial service on April 16, CJN reporter Frances Kraft reflects on the experience of going to synagogue to say Kaddish for her father. She finds it unexpectedly compelling and, although she always hesitates before admitting this, she says she likes it.

– The Editor

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

"We're here for you," "You're going to be OK" – and most of all, "We're your friends" – are words my mother, my sister and I never expected to hear from virtual strangers.

But our lives changed last July after my father, who had been living a busy and fulfilling post-retirement life, died of complications from a fall, and we began attending daily services to say Kaddish.

The prayer, as I knew before, makes no mention of death or the deceased person.

Rather, Kaddish, which praises God, is believed to elevate the soul of the person who has died. But no matter how many times I turn that idea over in my mind, I have no way of knowing, intellectually, whether it's true. Especially at first, I couldn't help wondering if my efforts constituted the equivalent of sending e-mails into cyberspace and not knowing if they had reached their destination.

I also like to think that maybe my father doesn't need my Kaddish because he was a good person, an idea planted in my mind by a family friend during the shivah. Fancifully, she visualized him being ushered to the front of the line to enter what my rabbi refers to as Olam Haba, the "World to Come."

I do know that saying Kaddish connects me to my family, my religion and my shul; and to others who are saying, have said, or will say Kaddish.

My mother, my sister and I never considered not saying Kaddish. To go that route, even if we had engaged someone to say it on our behalf, would have meant ignoring our instincts and rejecting the example that my dad had set.

From the beginning, I have found the experience compelling.

What surprises me most – and it feels, somehow, inappropriate – is that I enjoy it. But I'm not alone. Sandy Hayward, one of the people at my synagogue who has been generous with her emotional support, said that going to shul to say Kaddish was her guilty pleasure.

The pleasure, of course, comes with a price. People seem to think it's a burden to wake up early every morning for services, but I haven't found that part difficult. I am also fortunate to have flexibility both at home and work so that I can attend twice-daily services.

What is difficult is losing a parent. Many aspects of the service remind me of my dad, although they don't usually trigger "grief attacks" the way they did at the beginning.

The traditional 11-month period of Kaddish offers a way to deal with the year of mourning following a parent's death, and it works well in ways I didn't anticipate.

I didn't realize how much of my time at shul would be spent not grieving, although I'm always conscious at some level of the loss of my father, not having been in the habit of attending daily services before last July.

It's also not all about praying, even though prayer is the foundation of the service.

When you think about it – instead of just saying the words by rote – it is grounding to start the day with a service that includes prayers for a blessing on the earth, for the health of those who are sick, for peace.

There are also other benefits in having a routine. Unexpectedly, I find myself leaving shul better equipped to start my day, having mentally checked off the first major item of the morning.

At the same time, there is a sense of community that has little to do with prayer per se.

Seeing familiar faces every day is part of it, and shared perspectives play a role too. Brenda Cooper-Geffen, who lost her mother in late December, said we have a bond because we have chosen to mourn our parents in the same way.

People often remark on the warmth they feel at our synagogue, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am. My mother, my sister and I were moved by the fact that even strangers told us they were sorry for our loss. We were embraced – sometimes literally – by the congregation.

I used to hesitate about offering condolences to someone I knew only slightly, let alone a stranger. That changed almost immediately.

Brenda and I were talking recently about the camaraderie that is evident in our daily minyan. Whether our fellow shulgoers express friendship in words or more implicitly, they are there for us when we need support. And we are OK.

Shivah dos and don'ts

Recently, The CJN received a number of unrelated requests to publish a guide on what to do and say when paying a shivah visit. We have put together the following list using articles previously published in this paper, as well as outside sources.

• Don't hesitate to visit if you didn't know the person who died or are not a close friend or relative of the mourners. Visits from neighbours, colleagues and synagogue acquaintances remind mourners that the community, not just their own small circle, cares about them.

• Do visit during the day – particularly in the morning – if you want quality time with the mourner when fewer visitors are present.

• Don't convey condolences second-hand. Call, visit or send a card yourself.

• Do think about what you want to say before you go to the shivah – particularly what you want to say at the beginning and end of your visit.

• Do take your cue from the mourners regarding the topic of conversation and how much they feel like talking.

• Arrive on time if you are going for prayer services. Men should bring tallit and tfillin for morning services.

• Do limit small talk with other visitors in front of the mourners. It's better to catch up in another room, or after the visit.

• Do allow mourners to express grief without trying to change the subject or distract them.

• Keep visits short unless you are a close friend or family member.

• Do offer to help if you are staying longer, even if it's just to bring a cup of coffee to the mourners. Other ways to assist include taking children to school, or shopping for needed items. Be ready to help in ways that the mourner considers helpful.

• Do offer condolences to all the mourners who are nearby.

• Do share stories about the person who has died. Mourners often find it comforting.

• Don't question decisions that mourners have made, particularly health-care decisions that preceded the death.

• Do be sensitive to kashrut needs if you are providing food. Sephardi mourners do not eat meat during the shivah week.

• Don't arrive too early in the morning, or stay too late at night.

• Don't tell a mourner what to expect or that you know how he or she feels. Alternatives are, "Some people find that…"; "You might find that…"' or "I found that…"

• Don't arrive at meal times, unless you are helping to serve a meal and clean up. This may be the only time mourners have with each other, without visitors.

• Don't join the family at the table unless you are invited.

• The traditional Hebrew words of comfort when leaving a shiva house are "HaMakom yenachem etchem b'toch sha'ar avelei Tzion vi'Yerushalayim." ("May the Lord comfort you among the other mourners of Zion and Jerusalem.") They do not pre-empt the need to offer personal words of comfort.

• Do call when the shivah is over. Another visit or an offer to help in a specific way may be welcome, particularly if a mourner is older or doesn't feel like going out.

Other resources include:

It is a pleasure to extend Pesach greetings to you all on behalf of Canadian Jewish Congress, including my wonderful co-president, Sylvain Abitbol, and the dedicated CJC team.

Another year, another Pesach.

As much as it seems like same old, same old, we do whatever we can to not make it seem like same old, same old. Certainly, those around the table will immediately sense if we treat the seder that way – that is, as a chore that has to be done, the quicker the better.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

Without some measure of excitement, the seder will lack energy, purpose and meaning. So, it's highly recommended that we enter Pesach with renewed vigour.

Admittedly, this is easier said than done. But if you contemplate the issue more comprehensively, it will become apparent that this challenge of renewal is not restricted to Pesach. It is around us everywhere we turn – be it as spouses, as parents or as employees.

The more we see every day as a new opportunity, to be seized with enthusiasm, the more likely we are to succeed in our appointed mission, be it to infuse marriage with true affection, to transmit unconditional love to our children or to achieve the best results at work.

But we would be superhuman if we never felt a drop in enthusiasm, a sense of being tired, perhaps even drained. And the onerous preparations prior to Pesach, interspersed as they are with our usual obligations, become a recipe for exhaustion.

This is not a case of outsiders asking the impossible. Everyone is aware of the challenge without being asked by others. We ask this of ourselves, knowing full well that a good burst of fresh energy is most desirable, but not knowing where is the reservoir from which to gain that energy.

There are no magical answers, just some of the old stand-bys, such as daily exercise, periodic time-outs, days off, sharing the load, etc.

This year, we enter Pesach if not with new energy, at least with a new – as in 21st-century – challenge. We have seen this develop before our eyes: the slow but steady stream of anti-Semitic invective, sometimes couched in an anti-Zionist cloak, sometimes more blatant. And it's everywhere. Anti-Semitism is not new, but the modern variety is a new variation on an old theme.

Thankfully, we have a government that is vigilant in fighting it, and we are extremely grateful for this. We are also heartened that the official opposition supports the government in this vigilance, as do the other political parties, who have also spoken out strongly against anti-Semitism and intolerance. The fact that all political parties are on the same wavelength demonstrates that this is not merely a Jewish fight. It's a fight to maintain Canada and its sacred values intact, as a respectful, appreciative, harmonious society.

Pesach is well appreciated as the Festival of Freedom. To be free means to have human dignity, something we wish for everyone, including the estimated 27 million people who as you read this are still living as slaves. Yes, 27 million – if not more. And we are not including in this count those who are living under brutal, oppressive regimes.

On Pesach, the focus has been not merely on gaining freedom, but on what we do with that freedom, graduating from "freedom from" to "freedom towards."

That should not change. But we cannot escape the immediate communal challenge to achieve freedom from hate, from ill will, from denigration, from enmity.

That is a challenge for which we will need renewed individual and collective energy, at least as much energy as those adversaries who purvey the distasteful and often venomous words and deeds that are contrary to what we are all about, to what Canada is all about.

Where to find the reservoir for that energy? Perhaps in that effervescent well known as "no choice." We have no choice but to energetically confront this evil, because there is no choice, no acceptable alternative to a society infused with friendliness and a co-operative spirit.

I wish you all a meaningful, vigorous and fulfilling Pesach.

Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka is co-president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Child Holocaust survivor pens memoir

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Child Holocaust survivor Nelli Rotbart says that while it took her only two weeks to write her Holocaust memoir, Out of the Fire, on paper, she has been writing it in her mind for 40 years.

Rotbart was eight years old when the war started, and as with most survivors, she ultimately lost most of her immediate family. On Sept. 15, 1943, Rotbart, her parents and her older sisters, Sima and Eva, were ambushed in the woods where they were hiding in Poland. Nelli and Eva survived. The other family members were murdered.

The first 30 pages of her book are about her life in rural Poland in the 1930s and her memories of family and friends and neighbours. Her life was like that of any child who is a member of a loving family. Her father operated a store and was a cattle buyer. Her mother brought in additional income as a seamstress. Rotbart says she was a somewhat mischievous child with a passion for reading.

On Sept. 1, 1939, when the first German bombs fell on her village, everything changed. "It was the beginning of the end," she writes.

The next 70 pages recount her life on the run from the Nazis.

She observes that the signs were there before the war started, as many people had passed through the family's village over the summer months, fleeing east in anticipation of what was to come. She recounts the well-known restrictions against Jews. Her father lost his business. She and her sisters couldn't attend school. They had to have a large Magen David on the front of their house and wear the yellow star. There was frequent Nazi harassment.

The family was deported to a ghetto in 1941. They escaped from the ghetto, only to end up in another, They escaped again in 1942 and found temporary shelter with a sympathetic Polish farmer.

In the spring of 1943, the family was on the run again until they were found out and attacked in the woods. Eva and Nelli separated shortly after that and Nelli eventually found shelter with a Polish family where she pretended to be a Polish Christian girl.

The rest of Out of the Fire tells of her years living in the Soviet Union after the war.

"I was 14 when the war ended," she recalls. "I heard that there was going to be a transport to Russia leaving from Lublin. "I was romantic and naïve. I wanted to get out of Poland. I wanted an education. I thought that Russia was a country where there was no discrimination and everyone was equal."

It was only later that she realized her mistake.

On arrival in the Soviet Union, she says, she was placed in an orphanage for foreigners operated in Kiev by the NKVD, the Soviet secret police that was a forerunner of the KGB.

Nelli Rotbart

"The director was a nice lady who found me work in a factory," Rotbart recalls.

Over the next eight years, she was able to finish school and get training as a librarian. Her first posting as a librarian was in a village called Nikolajev on the Dneister River in Ukraine. After a year there, she was able to find work at a library in Odessa.

In Odessa, she married Aron Kaptsan, an engineer and chess player. (They divorced after they came to Canada in the early 1990s.)

Shortly afterward, Kaptsan found a position in Liepaja, Latvia, and Rotbart found work in a naval library. The couple had one daughter, Sima.

"In 1972, after the Helsinki Accords made it possible for Jews to leave Russia, my sister, Eva, who was living in Winnipeg, sent us an invitation to come here," Rotbart says.

"At that time, my husband didn't want to leave. When we finally agreed to apply to leave in 1979, the Afghanistan war was underway and the doors were closed."

Rotbart and her husband became Refuseniks, Soviet citizens who were denied permission to emigrate, and they were immediately dismissed from their jobs. "We were refused permission to leave five times," she recalls. "Finally, in 1982, they let us go."

Rotbart originally finished her manuscript seven or eight years ago and tried shopping it around to various publishers without success.

"I gave up trying to get it published," she says. "I did send a copy though to Concordia University, whose Judaic studies department was collecting memoirs of Holocaust survivors in Canada. The university put my memoirs on the Internet. People from my home village in Poland read my story and contacted my son-in-law by e-mail. They sent pictures of the village and we have kept in touch."

Rotbart eventually decided to self-publish after receiving encouragement from Carla Divinsky of the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada. She had close to 300 copies printed, half of which she has given away to friends and relatives, schools and universities. She has some copies for sale in local Winnipeg bookstores as well as in Chapters in Toronto.

Also included in her book is a poem, The Doomed, which she composed when she was 13 and in hiding in the fields on a scorching hot June day in 1943. While she had long forgotten the poem, she found when she came to Canada that her sister, Eva, had memorized it. The poem is now also on display at Yad Vashem.

Salad combinations with a different twist

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

I tend to introduce as many fruits, vegetables and salad greens into the menu as I possibly can during Passover week. I try to keep the matzah, matzah meal and farfel to a minimum in the following recipes. You can usually substitute any dried fruit for any other dried fruit in these recipes.

MELON AND ORANGE VINAIGRETTE

1 cup cantaloupe, cut into cubes
2/3 cup orange juice
2/3 cup vinegar
1/3 cup sugar
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. ground ginger

In a blender or food processor, combine all of the ingredients and process for 1-2 minutes or until smooth and creamy. Store in an airtight container in the refrigerator. Use as a dressing for salads or fruit or to add flavour to grains or vegetables. Makes 2 cups.

CLASSIC FROZEN FRUIT SALAD

This fruit salad recipe is a kid favourite at any dairy meal.

3 tbsp. finely chopped maraschino cherries
1 can (8 to 9 oz.) crushed pineapple, drained
2 cups sour cream
3/4 cup sugar
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1/8 tsp. salt
1/3 cup walnuts, coarsely chopped
1 banana, ripe but still firm, chopped

Place chopped cherries on paper towels to absorb moisture; set them aside. In a bowl, combine the sour cream, sugar, lemon juice and salt; stir in the pineapple, walnuts, and cherries. Stir in chopped banana. Spoon the mixture into paper-lined muffin cups and freeze until firm. To serve, let stand at room temperature for a few minutes to soften just slightly. Serves 8 to 10.

APPLE AND TUNA TOSSED SALAD

1 medium head romaine lettuce, torn into bite-size
1/3 cup chopped walnuts
2 cups diced apples, unpeeled
1 (6 1/2-oz.) can tuna, drained
1 (11-oz.) can mandarin oranges, drained
1/2 cup mayonnaise
1 tsp. lemon juice
1/2 tsp. sugar
salt and pepper to taste

In a large bowl, combine the lettuce, walnuts, apples, tuna and mandarin oranges. Toss together.

In another bowl, combine the mayonnaise, lemon juice, sugar, salt and pepper. Mix well. Toss the dressing with the salad. Serve immediately. Serves 6.

CHICKEN, BROCCOLI, RAISIN AND CASHEW SALAD

This recipe is great for using up left-over turkey or chicken

1 cup mayonnaise
1/2 cup sugar
2 tbsp. vinegar
1 tsp. paprika
1 large bunch broccoli flowerets
1 cup white onion, chopped
2 cans mandarin oranges, rinsed and drained
1 1/2 cup soft raisins
1 cup cashew pieces
2 to 3 cups turkey or chicken, cut into small pieces

In a bowl, combine the mayonnaise, sugar, vinegar and paprika. Cover and refrigerate overnight.

In a large bowl, combine the broccoli, onion, oranges and raisins. Just before serving, add cashews and chicken or turkey. Toss with dressing and serve. Serves 10 to 12.

Hillel trip to India will focus on helping others

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

July will be a month of firsts for Hillel of Greater Toronto as five Toronto students will join five Israeli students on a tikkun olam trip to India.

Rebecca Woods Baum, Hillel of Greater Toronto's immersive experience program co-ordinator, said this is the first time Hillel has worked on a trip with Hillel Israel and it will be the first time Hillel Toronto will travel to India.

Woods Baum said she was connected with the Israeli Friends of the Tibetan People (IFTP) through the efforts of IsraAID, a co-ordinating body of Israeli NGOs and groups that are active in development and relief work around the world.

"Through the IFTP, we are actually working with a Tibetan woman who is helping to organize the trip in India. It was IsraAID that came up with this idea and brought all these organizations together," Woods Baum said, adding that this is a pilot project for IsraAID founder Shachar Zahavi as well.

On July 12, five Toronto university students will travel to Israel to meet with five Israeli university students and participate in a four-day pre-trip orientation.

Woods Baum and the 10 students will travel together to India on July 16, where they will volunteer for four weeks in Dharamsala, a city that is home to the headquarters of the Tibetan government in exile.

"We're working in the Tibetan Children's Village, which is also where we will be living, and we'll be doing different things like helping them with their English… computer skills. We'll be running day-to-day programs," Woods Baum said.

"There is also talk of helping to restore a Tibetan museum in Dharamsala. We're just going to see what's needed there and what we can help out with."

Before they head to Dharamsala, Woods Baum said, the group will fly into New Delhi, where they'll have the opportunity to tour the area.

She added that she wants to ensure the programming offers educational opportunities.

"While they are in Israel, they will meet with the Indian Ambassador to Israel… When we're in New Delhi, we're going to try to set up a meeting with the Israeli ambassador to India, so we can have that exchange, and we're going to see if we can meet up with Indian Jews living in Israel to have a cultural exchange."

The cost of the trip, $2,750, covers everything including the flights, food, which will be strictly vegetarian, accommodation and travelling in Israel and India.

"We were able to get some funding from the community, which was very much appreciated, to help subsidize it," she said.

Rebecca Woods Baum

With only five spots available, Woods Baum said she's looking for applications from mature students who have volunteer experience.

"We're going to a developing country. It will be taxing and it will be a culture shock."

One of the aspects of the program that Woods Baum said she is enthusiastic about is the opportunity to create lasting connections between Israelis and Canadians.

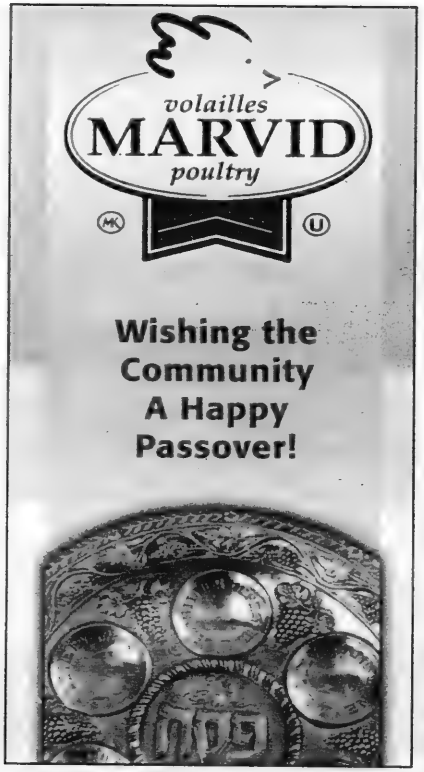
"Given everything that's been going on on campus, we're using this trip as an engagement tool – bringing students into Hillel who maybe wouldn't normally come in to Hillel, who might be scared away from all the Israel advocacy on campus," she said.

"To me, going to India is a great opportunity for most students. We find students today are looking to travel with meaning. They want to see the world, but they want to do something meaningful while they're there. I think they'll be able to do that in India, but also they'll be able to meet other Israelis and maybe have difficult conversations.

"To actually be able to talk to an Israeli about it and have a conversation with their peers is probably the best advocacy we can do as a community," Woods Baum said, adding that she hopes to organize followup programming when they return from India, to keep the students engaged.

"Next year, if the trip is successful, we can go to other places in the world, we can accept more students and maybe even involve other Hillels throughout the world."

Applications will be accepted until May 15. For more information, call 416-913-2424.



York University investigates student election

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The slate that lost last month's York Federation of Students' elections has now involved the school's administration in its appeal to have the results invalidated because of incidents it says "compromised the integrity" of the vote.

The slate York Forward ran against Students First, a rival slate that it accused of supporting the outgoing executive, which York Forward said focused too much on non-campus issues such as the Arab-Israeli conflict and supported York's recent 12-week strike by contract faculty and teaching assistants.

York Forward's 11-page appeal to the YFS elections committee – which detailed a number of "procedural irregularities" and "suspicious circumstances" during the campaign and the four days of voting – was sent to York's administration late last month in the hope that the school won't recognize the incoming leadership, said Carly Caruso, a York Forward campaign manager who co-wrote the appeal.

Robert Tiffin, York's vice-president of students, said he is reviewing the appeal and asking the YFS elections committee for "additional clarification."

"At this point, I want to see the process they go through… and I want to see a copy of the chief returning officer's report as well," Tiffin said.

CRO Casey Chu Cheong wasn't available to speak to The CJN, but York's campus newspaper, Excalibur, reported last week that she was still investigating and would present a report on the results to YFS council at a meeting this week. She will also make a recommendation on the appeal that will be voted on by council.

Tiffin said that the elections were closely monitored by the administration, because it collects fees for YFS from students and it has "a fiduciary responsibility overall to ensure that there is democratic renewal."

He said that whether or not the results will be invalidated is up to YFS, but the administration has the power to decide if it will recognize the new leadership.

"We'd have to see something very dramatic that indicates that the election was tampered with. There would have to be substantial evidence of that," Tiffin said.

The CJN offices will be closed April 9-10

Mock to head Canadian Friends of Haifa U

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Karen Mock, who is regarded as one of Canada's foremost specialists in anti-racist education, was recently appointed the president of Canadian Friends of Haifa University to help promote and raise funds for Israel's most pluralistic university.

In February, Mock, who served 12 years as the national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, succeeded Peter Biro after he stepped down from his post a few months early.

A registered psychologist and educator, Mock has initiated several public education campaigns, including the Black/Jewish Dialogue, Women's Interfaith Dialogue and Muslim/Jewish Dialogue.

Karen Mock

"My experience comes into play on the domestic level because here in Canada, we want people… to know about Haifa University and the kind of model that it presents to the world of diversity and peaceful coexistence in action," Mock said.

With more than 17,000 students, the 36-year-old university has a diverse population made up of Jews, Arabs, Druze, and new immigrants from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia.

The University of Haifa boasts the highest percentage of Arab students and Arab faculty members of any Israeli institution of higher learning.

Nearly 20 per cent of the student body is made up of Arab students, which is equivalent to the proportion of the Arab population in Israel.

"[Haifa] is a mixed city and there are programs that build on enhancing Arab-Jewish relations, supporting the State of Israel through research and programming through peaceful coexistence," said Mock, who is also on the international board of governors of the university.

"People here who are working in dialogue together – Jews, Muslims, Israelis, Palestinians, Arabs – who have benefited from Haifa University and other Israeli universities, can also have their voices empowered and not controlled by the extremists on campus."

She said that the people around the world who are working to get support for academic boycotts against Israeli academic institutions are extremists who are spreading propaganda.

"We need to get the message out that in Israel there are people living with a common ancestry and connection with the land who have to coexist. Those here in Canada who don't want to hear about that need to understand that mutual annihilation is not an option," she said.

"Here in this country, I hope to use my experience and my contacts in a wide range of communities to increase awareness of Haifa University and also to help students, especially in these challenging times on campuses, to understand the important contribution that Israel and Israeli professors have made to the world."

She hopes to work with other organizations to "promote the antithesis of what the boycotts are about," she added.

Mock said that while it is important in any democracy to have open discourse to ensure the rights of all minorities are valued and respected, it is important to defend Israel's right to exist and to self-determination.

"Are there ways that we can improve human rights? Yes, every democracy has to struggle with that and needs to, but most of the people who go along with those boycotts don't know the history, and have no idea of the amazing contribution that Israeli scientists, academics, and their universities have made both to Israelis and minorities in Israel, but also, of course, to the world."

Mock stressed Israel's contribution to the field of technology, medicine and science.

"That is what we need to promote."

She said she looks forward to spreading positive messages about Israel and the university, but needs the help of Canadian Jewish communities.

"The biggest challenge will be to raise awareness and therefore increase support for the university, and it will be an extra challenge during this economic climate to those of us who support the State of Israel," Mock said.

"But Toronto has one of the strongest and most committed Jewish communities in the world."

MS Society enters blogosphere

Compiled by CJN Staff

The movement to end multiple sclerosis has reached the blogosphere with the launch of EveryStepMatters.ca.

Focused on the April 19 MS Walk, a national fundraising event for the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada with 160 walk sites across Canada, the new blog promises to enable the MS society to connect with people in a new and different way.

"This is a new approach to communication for non-profit organizations," says Ken Mayhew, chief development officer of the society. "Interactivity and participation are what make it special. [The blog] is the new frontier of communicating, and we do feel that we're ahead of the curve with this initiative."

Launched in February, EveryStepMatters.ca has already attracted hundreds of visitors. Bloggers and other contributors share thoughts and ideas related to their involvement in their local MS Walk – expectations, preparation, fundraising tips and stories of past participation. Every contribution matters, and ultimately, every step matters in the attempt to end multiple sclerosis.

"With EveryStepMatters.ca, the MS Society is sending messages in totally new ways and creating direct relationships with a broad network of people," Mayhew says. "What everyone has in common is the commitment to end MS."

Communicating through the fast-growing world of social media is also a direct way for the society to raise awareness of MS among a new audience while promoting its fundraising events and other activities. According to State of the Blogosphere research on Technorati.com, blogs have become integral to the media ecosystem. Seventy-seven per cent of active Internet users read blogs, and bloggers across the globe post messages a million times each day.

The MS Walk has also launched pages on social networking sites Facebook and Twitter, with more than 1,000 combined followers after only one month. Facebook members share stories, view photos and connect with others who want to help end MS, while Twitter users post and follow quick updates on all things related to the MS Walk.

To register for the MS Walk, go to www.mswalks.ca or call 1-888-822-8467. MS Walk social networking sites are at www.everystepmatters.ca, www.twitter.com/mswalk or http://www.facebook.com/pages/MS-Walk/62256087984?ref=mf.

DNA scientist to speak in Vancouver

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — If you've never heard of DNA methylation, you can learn about the subject when Prof. Howard Cedar comes to the city.

The man known worldwide as the father of DNA methylation – chemical changes in the DNA molecule – delivers a seminar titled Silence of the Genes at UBC Life Sciences Institute from 11 a.m. to noon on April 22.

Cedar is the guest of Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU) this month when he comes into Vancouver to celebrate the pending opening of the new Institute of Medical Research Israel Canada (IMRIC) at Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

CFHU is hoping to raise some $50 million in the next few years to make the institute a reality. When its doors open, the IMRIC will consolidate a number of areas of bio-research at the Hebrew University Faculty of Medicine in Ein Kerem, Jerusalem, thereby facilitating multi-disciplinary collaboration. Those fields are infectious disease and immunology, cancer, genetics and developmental biology, nutrition and metabolism, cardiovascular disease, and the brain and the central nervous system.

Cedar will be one of the faculty members to relocate his office to the new institute, and though the move sounds organizational, it's much more than that, he says. "This change towards multidisciplinary collaboration between the biological and medical sciences is going on all over the world," he says.

"If you want to study a disease, the only way to do it is by bringing people from different disciplines together so they can have day-to-day contact and use common equipment and facilities."

Cedar should know. His research may have groundbreaking implications in the study and possible future remedy of cancer and has already received acclaim. He won the equivalent of the Nobel Prize in Israel – the Wolf Prize, last year, receiving $100,000 for his work.

The process of DNA methylation turns on and off the 40,000-odd genes in the body. While everyone inherits genetic information, it has to be used in a programmed manner, Cedar explains. "That programming is called epigenetics, and the older one gets, the more likely the programming mechanism is to make mistakes. Changes in epigenetics could predispose a person to cancer, and in only five per cent of cancer cases is methylation not involved."

Cedar is an observant father of six who was born in the United States. After medical school, he received his doctorate from New York University in 1970. He conducted research at the U.S. National Institutes of Health before making aliyah with his wife, Tzippi, and accepting a position at the Jerusalem medical school's department of cellular biochemistry and human genetics 36 years ago.

Thanks to his work on the fundamentals of DNA methylation since the early 1970s, the field has expanded.

"There are a number of diseases in which DNA methylation plays a very big role, and as a result new methodologies are now being used, which are enriching the field, as well as work being done on a drug that can inhibit DNA methylation," Cedar says.

But research is in its relatively early stages, he adds. "In mice, there are a number of different tumours that can be prevented by using agents that prevent DNA methylation, but it's a very big step to go from mice to people."

Cedar is a modest man who shies away from celebrity and describes curiosity as his main motivator. "No one starts off saying, I'm going to cure this, but the nice thing is that when you do your research, often you discover something that will be part of the big picture in the end," he says.

"That's as important as curing the disease, because it provides information and concepts for other scientists, to help them do their work. So I'll be very happy if my contribution helps by allowing someone else do something practical."

Summerhill LCBO sells entire stock of Israeli wine to fight the boycott by purchasing Israeli wine.

The result was a successful counter-boycott that attracted about 600 supporters of Israel to the Summerhill LCBO, who bought out the store's entire stock of Israeli wine.

LCBO spokesperson Chris Layton said that a total of 1,455 bottles of Israeli kosher wine and spirits were sold at the Summerhill LCBO on Sunday.

Ami Cohen, who was also supporting Israel, said the boycotters left soon after the counter-demonstration began.

"They had about six people here. They came here and then they left."

Layton said that when the Summerhill location sold out, staff encouraged consumers to visit other LCBO locations that carry a large selection of Israeli kosher products.

A staff member at the LCBO at Bathurst and Centre streets in Thornhill said the store's entire stock of Israeli wine was sold out.

John Begley, general manager of the Summerhill LCBO, said about 500 people walked through the doors at the Summerhill LCBO to purchase Israeli wine.

"I can tell you that I had not only stock of Israeli kosher wine to meet our normal demand, based on historical data… but I also had some residual stock as well."

He said the store was completely sold out by around 2 p.m. Non-Israeli kosher wine also sold well, but the stock wasn't completely sold out.

With the sun shining and the temperature in the double digits, hundreds of people draped in Israeli flags and carrying signs that said, "Support Israel. Buy Israeli wine," and, "Israeli apartheid = Pure Balderdash," demonstrated on Yonge Street outside the store.

Jerry Klayman, a JDL member, said that although the boycott was called for 1 p.m., he showed up at 11 a.m. "to secure a spot."

"We have groups from UJA, the JDL, B'nai Brith, and it's a beautiful thing to see all the people come out and get behind Israel. That is the most important thing," Klayman said.

"The other side doesn't look like they have much representation… Now we're hoping to get the same [anti-Israel] group to protest against matzah, so maybe that will help them sell matzah. And then gefilte fish," he said with a laugh.

Pro-Israel demonstrators were joined by Yids on Wheels, a Jewish motorcycle club, and a Chabad cube van drove up and down Yonge Street blaring Hebrew songs.

Pro-Israel supporters waved Israeli flags as they danced and sang Hatikvah in front of the store.

Federations start to feel recession's bite

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The recent economic downturn has had an impact on Canadian Jewish federations, but the effect is less dramatic than in the United States, where three of the largest federations have announced significant layoffs over the past few weeks.

Linda Kislowicz, executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC), told The CJN last week that the impact here varies from community to community.

Some Canadian UJA campaigns show slight decreases while others are "holding," she said. American federations have been hit harder, in part because their campaigns begin later in the year, she added.

Canadian campaigns typically start in August or September, Kislowicz said, and the full scope of the recession only became evident later. As well, she said, the American economy has been hit "way harder.

"We have concerns, certainly, about next year."

Kislowicz noted that there have been some reductions in budget allocations, both locally and nationally. They range from less than five per cent to between 12 and 15 per cent, she said.

The UIAFC budget has been cut almost 15 per cent, with a resulting 10 per cent cut in national allocations. As well, a total of five UIAFC positions have been cut in Toronto and Israel since the beginning of March. Four people are no longer working for the organization, and the other position was cut by reducing hours, Kislowicz said.

In Toronto, 10 full-time jobs were eliminated from the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (the Mercaz) in early March, but the move did not have to do with the economic downturn, federation spokesperson Howard English said at the time. The federation has announced an additional $500,000 for tuition subsidies, and "hopefully, enhanced funding for supplementary schools and special education."

Seymour Epstein, who was the federation's senior vice-president for Mercaz until April 8, was offered a senior position with the federation, but is no longer with the organization as of that date.

There was also one federation staff position eliminated outside the Mercaz, but English would not confirm whether it was a staff or contract position, citing confidentiality of personnel information. He said that there "are no cuts anticipated at this time."

Plans to demolish the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and replace it with a new facility called the Prosserman JCC are expected to proceed this fall. The BJCC will remain open until Sept. 27, English said.

The estimated cost of the building a year ago was $160 million, of which $85 million in cash donations had been raised at the time.

Toronto's campaign revenue for this year stands at $62.5 million and is expected to reach $65 million, just under last year's total of $66 million, said English. Totals for the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto are not yet being made public.

In Montreal, Federation CJA has had to cut programs and jobs because of the economic situation (see article on page 39).

Kislowicz said, "We need people to understand that we need everyone to participate and stretch even in times when it might be hard. In times like these, our focus is on protecting those who need our help."

There is a double whammy of "growing needs, and in some cases diminished capacity," she said.

Since the beginning of March, the Jewish federations in New York, Cleveland and Atlanta have laid off between 11 per cent and 25 per cent of their professional staffs. Each organization cited shrinking donations because of the economic downturn as the reason behind the moves.

Howard Rieger, the president and CEO of the federation system's national organization, the United Jewish Communities, expressed significant concern for the system and UJC's own well-being as an organization that relies on dues from increasingly cash-strapped federations.

His comments follow a run of layoffs at major federations, among them:

• On March 11, the country's largest federation, the UJA-Federation of New York, which raised some $153 million in its annual campaign last year, announced that it was cutting 52 employees – slightly more than 11 per cent of its staff. The federation is 10 per cent behind in its fundraising pledges compared to the previous year and 12 per cent behind on collections, and has seen its $675-million endowment shrink by 25 per cent.

• The same day, the Jewish Federation of Greater Atlanta laid off 14 employees in an effort to cut 19 per cent from its operating budget – the second round of layoffs that the federation has faced, according to UJC staff members.

• On March 5, the Jewish Federation of Greater Cleveland announced that it had laid off 25 staffers as part of a plan to trim $600,000 from its operating expenses in the face of a $3-million budget shortfall. Donations to the federation's annual campaign reportedly are down by about $5 million, and its endowment funds have decreased in value by 29 per cent.

Rieger is warning that the federations are dangerously close to putting their operations in jeopardy if they have to cut more.

It's a message that hits close to home for the UJC.

In May, the UJC cut 37 jobs in an effort to reduce its budget from $40.2 million to $37 million, and it's facing more cuts in the near future.

The organization is under intense pressure from the federations it serves to cut its budget even further.

Rieger has offered to slice the budget another 10 per cent and is waiting to see if that will be sufficient for the federations. The decision could be made over the next several weeks, as the UJC is set to hold budget meetings soon in Chicago.

אני חייבת להודות, אני קצת מוטרדת מליל הסדר. בישראל אחזנו, מאיר ואני, בשמונה אחים במשותף. שמונה אחים למאיר, בת יחידה- אני. סעודת החגים היו משפחתיות, מגוונות ומרגשות (שמונה אחים על נשותיהם המרושעות וטפם ההיפראקטיבי- אצל הזדיו של מאיר, ומשפחה לא מתפקדת, פלוס הורים גרושים-אצלי).

"אני מתגעגע למאכלים של אמא שלי." מיילל לי מאיר הנוגה. "אני רוצה קניידלעך..." הוא מתפנק, ולא עוזר שאני מזכירה לו שאמו, מוצאה ממצרים, ומעולם לא נמסר כדור קניידל טועה אחד אל שולחן הפסח המשפחתי שלו.

בעיקר אני מתגעגעת לגיסתי שרון, שתמיד מחמיאה לי על המאכל היחיד שמאיר מרשה לי להביא לשולחן המשפחתי ("איזה מתוקה נינה. איך חשוב לה שלא נאכל הרבה ושנעשה דיאטה, אז היא מביאה לנו את המאכלים שלה..."). גם אל הניס שלי, מיקי, נפשי כמהה.

אז החלטתי לספק להם את אותה החוויה, כמעט.

שולה מופתעת מאוד שאני מזמינה אותה, על משפחתה, לליל הסדר. מובן שאין לה תוכניות (נו...) והיא מסכימה בהיסוס.

אני מתקשרת ליגאל, ידיד לשעבר של מאיר, שהבטיח לנו שהוא כבר ייסדר אותנו בקבוצה (בעבודה, בחברה), ובאמת "סידר" אותנו בהונן, ועד היום חייב לנו המון כסף.

יגאל מתגלה מאוד על ההזמנה, ורק כשאני נשבעת שאני לא רוצה בשום אופן את הכסף שלי בחזרה, ניאות לבוא אף הוא לארוחה.

ולבשל לעשרים ואחד איש, ובמהירות). אבל, כמו שאמרה מי שאמרה בישראל, אני נשמה מתחשבת ולא רוצה שאף אחד ישמין אצלי...

חוץ מזה, האווירה תהיה, מן הסתם, מדהימה ובעיקר- משפחתית. אנחנו הרי תמיד נמשכים אל המוכר. ואם לא יתחשק לי להיות אחר כך בקשר עם האנשים האלה, אני לא דואגת. יש לי את שולה, שתעליב כבר מישהו, את יגאל, שיהיה כבר חייב כסף למישהו, את אלקסנדרה שתגונב כבר איזה בעל למישהי, ולקינוח- את ג'ייק, שיסכסך כבר בין כולם. ממש כמו בבית!

Montreal federation makes cuts, balances budget

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Through cuts to programs and jobs and drawing on its savings, Federation CJA in Montreal has managed to balance its budget for 2009-2010, president Marc Gold said.

A few jobs within the federation and its agencies have been eliminated, others downsized and some vacant positions will not be filled. A system-wide salary freeze was also imposed.

The federation is allocating $32.5 million to local, national and international programs and services this year.

The impact of the economic downturn on the federation has been dramatic, Gold said, and he warned that more belt-tightening may be ahead.

However, he added, it's likely the average community member will not see a major impact on what the federation or its agencies offer.

The federation was left with a $3.6 million shortfall after revenues from the 2008 Combined Jewish Appeal were down, as was interest on the federation's capital. At the same time, demand for support from the community's neediest was up.

At its close in November, CJA announced that it expected that pledges would total $40.3 million, almost matching the 2007 campaign total.

In fact, Gold said pledges were down by $1.3 million, while interest on capital decreased by $850,000 and so-called shrinkage, primarily due to pledges not being honoured, reduced the funds available to spend by a further $1 million.

On top of that, more money is needed for tuition assistance for students at Jewish day schools whose parents can't pay and for basic support to the poorest.

Altogether, these costs, which have been deemed unavoidable, amount to an additional $500,000, Gold said.

After a lengthy process, Gold believes the federation has been able to minimize the impact on its core programs and services, and to redirect resources where there is the greatest need.

A balanced budget was achieved by reducing national and international allocations, as well as allocations to the federation itself and its agencies. The federation also dipped into money that it had set aside last year in anticipation of this year's difficulties, he said.

Wherever possible, costs were cut by reducing overhead, sharing back-office resources and reducing building hours.

"But, inevitably, programs had to be eliminated or reduced in scope, and that did have an impact on staffing at Federation CJA and at several agencies," Gold said.

Programs that have not been touched are those benefitting the most vulnerable, such as the Community Assistance Program, which provides direct financial assistance to those in need.

"As difficult as this was, I am proud to say that we collaborated fully with our agencies and national partners in setting communal priorities. Together, we made certain that the basic and essential services that we provide to our community remained firmly in place," Gold wrote in a letter to community leaders.

"Indeed, we did not reduce our allocations to the programs that address the needs of those most in need of our services. Moreover, we have taken a number of steps to meet the increasing needs of our community as a result of the tough economic times."

Of the $32.5 million in allocations, 68 per cent is local, 32 per cent to Israel, and the rest to national agencies and services. This does not include the $10 million in one-time gifts designated by the donors for projects in Israel collected during last year's CJA.

Sutton Group Admiral blazes new trails in real estate

Murray Goldkind
Broker of Record

Using a simple formula of maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle for its agents, Sutton Group Admiral Realty has experienced the kind of spectacular growth that has surpassed even its own high expectations.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team, which now numbers over 220 agents, has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to enter the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Brokers Of Record and co-owners Saul and Murray Goldkind pride themselves on their ability to read and respond to the needs of home buyers and sellers. Says Murray: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't." And implicit in this value, he notes, is the quality of service provided by the broker or agent. "If you have to do more than say, 'I'll take the red one,' we're not doing our job."

In its dual capacity as reseller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work "24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

CJC changes name in Quebec

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec Region, n'est plus.

The organization that speaks for the province's Jewish community is now officially called Congrès juif québécois, Section québécoise du Congrès juif canadien or, in English, Quebec Jewish Congress, the Quebec division of Canadian Jewish Congress.

The name change, which is effective immediately, was approved unanimously by the Quebec regional officers and, with the exception of one dissenting vote, by the national officers of CJC, said regional president Victor Goldbloom. He added that the national co-presidents Rabbi Reuven Bulka and Montrealer Sylvain Abitbol have personally enthusiastically endorsed the change.

While there was some questioning from a few people when the matter was brought before the national body in March, only one person ultimately cast a negative ballot, and he is not from Quebec, Goldbloom said.

Goldbloom said the idea of giving the regional CJC a new name that makes Quebec more prominent has been discussed for a number of months internally.

"The feedback that we have been getting from the media and in public opinion in general, regardless of political affiliation, is that we should be more explicitly identified with Quebec, that such a move would be positively perceived," he said.

Jews have lived in Quebec for 249 years, he said, and are an integral part of this society and should be seen to be so.

The name change does not alter in any way the region's relationship with the national body or its mandate, Goldbloom emphasized, and that's why the official name continues to include "Canadian Jewish Congress."

"It's not that the Canadian in our name was a negative or is being rejected, it is that 'Quebec' is a positive," he said.

Goldbloom, who was a Quebec cabinet minister in the 1970s, has been on a speaking tour of the province over the past year, and his impression is that if he was introduced as the head of a clearly Quebec-identified organization, it would be welcome. On the couple of occasions that he floated the idea of the name Congrès juif québécois, he was applauded.

As for why the new name could not have been Congrès juif du Québec, rather than using the politically charged word "Québécois," Goldbloom said this was discussed and it was decided that because the name is Congrès juif canadien, it made the most sense to change that last word to its adjectival equivalent.

"I agree 'Québécois' can be politically charged, but the Jewish community has been an integral part of this society for 249 years. During the recent 'reasonable accommodation' debate and so on there was a tendency to put the Jewish community in the same category as other communities who have come here much more recently," he said. "It is important to be identified as an integral part of this society."

As has been the custom for decades, the French version of the name will predominate on any official correspondence or documentation. He said the CJC constitution does not appear to put up any obstacle to such a name change.

Coverage of alleged Gaza abuses raises questions

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last week, this column looked at how the Canadian and international media jumped on allegations that Israeli soldiers acted improperly during the war in Gaza. As it turned out, an investigation by Israeli military police into the charges found that they were based on rumours and hearsay rather than eyewitness reports, and so were factually groundless.

Perhaps not surprisingly, the dismissal of the reports received much less media attention than the initial allegations. For example, on March 20, the Toronto Star gave the supposed Israel Defence Forces misconduct front-page prominence. It covered the inquiry result in a brief, March 31 Associated Press story titled "Israel rules out charges in Gaza deaths."

AP reported: "Citing insufficient evidence and hearsay, the Israeli military yesterday closed an investigation into two cases of alleged killings of Gaza civilians that had caused an uproar in Israel and around the world."

Similarly, the Globe and Mail ran a very brief excerpt from a New York Times report ("Israeli military closes Gaza abuse probe," March 31) that noted: "The military police found that 'the crucial components of their descriptions were based on hearsay and not supported by specific personal knowledge,' the army said."

The original March 31 New York Times piece, "Israeli Army Ends Inquiry Into Soldiers' Accounts of Gaza Abuses," by Isabel Kershner, supplied many more details. Kershner wrote: "Specifically, a soldier's claim that orders had been given to fire at an elderly Palestinian woman who entered a no-go zone was found to be based on a rumour, according to the military. Another case, in which a soldier had supposedly been ordered to fire at a woman and two children, was also found not to have been witnessed by the soldier who gave the account."

Kershner noted that the allegations had arisen from the accounts of soldiers at a pre-military college, and that "the academy's director, Dany Zamir, told Army Radio on Monday that he accepted the... report. Still, he added, 'If soldiers will now feel that they cannot talk because of the outcome of this specific story, then this is very bad for us as a society and army.'

"On the other hand, he stated, it was not his intention to attract news media attention by making the contents of the soldiers' discussion public. He added that the news media's focus on the story 'truly complicated everything.'"

This entire episode raises some important questions. Should the media, both in Israel and internationally, have given so much prominence to a story based on rumours, especially with sensational coverage that made the allegations look like fact? Is it sufficient for many of the same news outlets to carry, many days later, very brief reports of an investigation that showed the allegations were false? Once the damage has been done, is this adequate repair?

As many Israeli analysts explained, no one is pretending that the IDF did not make mistakes in the heat of battle. Rather, the media have a responsibility to place Israel's actions in proper perspective, and to maintain a sense of proportionality in judging Israeli conduct.

The Israeli army was facing a new kind of enemy – not another army, but rather Hamas, a "non-state actor" that deliberately embeds itself among the civilian population. In such circumstances, mistakes – and even wrongful actions – are bound to occur, no matter how careful Israeli forces are in trying to avoid harming innocent civilians.

But when the world latches on to unsubstantiated allegations of isolated wrongdoing and ignores the army's greater commitment to moral conduct, Israelis feel alone, unfairly tarnished and, indeed, betrayed.

The Toronto Star's March 22 editorial, "Shun Sudan's leader," denounced the decision of the Arab League, which held its recent summit in Qatar, to embrace Sudan's president Omar al-Bashir in defiance of his recently being indicted by the International Criminal Court for war crimes in Darfur. Al-Bashir's "Arab-led regime in Khartoum" is responsible for killing 300,000 people in Darfur and driving three million from their homes. As to the Arab League, the Star wrote that "even a club of kings, strongmen and despots shames itself by breaking bread with a man accused of murder, transfer, torture and rape."

Is he dependent or not?

Family Matters

Family Lawyer & Mediator for 26 years

Question: My 19-year-old lives with his mother. He has been out of school since January and has been working part time. A few months ago, I stopped paying child support. She took me to court and was granted temporary support payment, which is still being enforced.

She knowingly misinformed the court, claiming that he had applied to college and was accepted. On the next court date, instead of presenting the facts to the court, she shows up with his exam results stating he is short 3-1/2 credits and is reapplying to attend grade 11.

The court asked her to present proof of this information. I understood that if a child is 18, not in school and mentally and physically stable, the access parent is not legally bound to support the child.

This kid is over 19 and has not been in school since January. Why is the court ordering me to pay child support for this kid?

Answer: It could be that the court felt that the child was a dependent. If his mother will not file documentary proof within a specified time, then the court will likely halt the support payments.

But so long as the child is reapplying to go back to grade 11, he is still a dependent. Also, if you are representing yourself, the court may not be as persuaded as you think it should be. Finally, if the child is truly lazy and refuses to sit in the classroom and is content working in a retail outlet rather than being in school, then you certainly do not have to support him. But if the child is failing in school or dropping out because of a learning disability, the court will be very sympathetic to that child and his mother.

On behalf of my family, and all of us at Garfin Zeidenberg, I wish you and your family a happy and healthy Passover.

Tories reversed government voting pattern at UN: Day

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — International Trade Minister Stockwell Day last week delivered an ardent defence of Israel, lauded Canada's relative good position in the world economic crisis, and pledged Prime Minister Stephen Harper's unwavering commitment to upholding human rights.

Several times, audience members at the Chevra Kadisha B'nai Jacob Synagogue stood to applaud the Tory member of Parliament for Okanagan–Coquihalla.

The synagogue's Rabbi Asher Jacobson and president Les Schiller praised Day before and after his April 2 talk.

Day delivered pre-Passover greetings and struck an informal tone in a 45-minute talk that covered a range of issues, from last week's G20 summit to Canada's role in Afghanistan and the war on terror.

Day got the most positive feedback when he talked about how the Conservative Party – both in opposition and in power – has not wavered in its support of Israel and when he spoke about the Tory stance against anti-Semitism, as well as for the government's United Nations voting record and its position on terrorism.

It was the Tories who pledged to reverse decades of Canadian voting at the United Nations that either supported or abstained from resolutions critical of Israel, Day said.

"We said then, 'If the government ever changes, that will, too,'" Day said.

The Conservatives under Harper have lived up to the promise by supporting Israel at the UN and refusing to attend "Durban II" (the followup to the 2001 World Conference Against Racism, at which Israel was singled out as racist), he said.

Day has visited Israel three times and described his first visit with his wife, Val, about five years ago as "one of the most memorable of our lives."

Unforgettable to him was his trip to the northern border, where on display just, on the other side, were billboards containing images of Israeli soldiers being tortured.

"You never see these things in the media," he said.

Day wondered aloud why Israel is held up to standards that no other country is.

When he speaks at campuses, he said, students seem unaware of basic information on Israel, such as Israel being "an island of democracy surrounded by a sea of dictatorships," or that Muslims in Israel enjoy full religious freedom and can even serve on its Supreme Court.

While in Israel, Day, a Pentecostal, wanted to go to church. The church's Muslim caretaker had a key to the building. A Jewish Israeli friend joined Day and the caretaker, and the three of them struggled to get into the building.

"Where else in the world would a Jew and a Muslim help a Christian 'break into' a church?" he asked to laughter.

On his second trip, Day visited Sderot, which was under barrage by Hamas. "Why is it when someone attacks Israel it's a 'rocket attack,' but when Israel responds, it's 'bombing,'" Day asked.

While the world has condemned Israel for responding, he said Harper has said that "every country has a right to defend itself."

Day remembered that as public safety minister, he was accompanied by Jewish community officials to a Muslim school in Montreal that had been vandalized.

He said that "so often it's members of the Jewish community who appeal on behalf of other religions because they know what it's like not to be protected."

It was while Day was public safety minister last year that he and Israeli Public Security Minister Avi Dichter co-signed a deal to cooperate on issues pertaining to border security, illegal immigration and organized crime.

He was incredulous that Iranian leader Mahmoud Ahmadinejad – who has pledged to destroy Israel – was received with applause at the UN.

"How could this happen, to applaud the leader of a state who wants the destruction of Israel?" Day asked.

Day reported that at the recent G20 summit Canada was lauded in the media for being "the best prepared for the economic crisis" and that coming out of it Canada would emerge "in best shape" because of its conservative and prudent banking system.

The current economic stimulus plan will "accelerate" to two years, instead of seven, $30 billion worth of infrastructure projects, he said.

Day said Canada is still pledged to end its military involvement in Afghanistan by 2011, but remains committed to helping the country in other ways.

Few are aware, he said, that million of Afghans have been inoculated against polio, or of Canada's work to educate Afghan children. But Day was highly critical of a law just passed by the Afghanistan government that "severely attacks the rights of women."

Day was asked whether he thought Israel was doing a poor job of advocacy in light of negative media coverage. He replied, to laughter, that if the Jewish people control the media, as some people think, "they're doing a very poor job."

Day quoted Mark Twain, who said, "A lie is halfway around the world even before the truth has its boots on."

Jewish golf club allies with once-restricted facility

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The irony of a strategic alliance between the largely Jewish Glendale Golf and Country Club and the prestigious 135-year-old Manitoba Club is not lost on George Gershman.

A former general manager of the Glendale Club, Gershman, 86, remembers when the Manitoba Club was off limits to Jews and women.

He recalled that Samuel Freedman, Manitoba's first Jewish chief justice, regularly refused invitations to dine at the Manitoba Club because it wouldn't accept Jewish members.

"I once attended a function at the Manitoba Club with my wife. The attendant at the door tried to insist that she enter through the women's entrance at the side. I insisted that she walk in with me and we went in together," Gershman said. "

Under terms of the alliance agreement – which aims in part to boost membership in both clubs – Manitoba Club members who also join the Glendale Golf Club will get a 30 per cent reduction in annual dues – currently $3,450 – and won't have to pay an initiation fee. Glendale members who want to also join the Manitoba Club – whose fees vary from $955 to $2,000, depending on age – will also get a 30 per cent reduction in annual dues and not have to pay the one-time entrance fee.

"There have been a number of inquiries already," said Michael Kay, Glendale's vice-president.

The Manitoba Club is the oldest private club in North America. The Glendale Club, which currently has 375 members, was founded in 1946 by local Jews specifically because they weren't allowed to join other private clubs or golf clubs in Winnipeg.

"Originally, Glendale was a country club, not a golf club," said Kay, whose grandfather, Hyman Kay, was one of the club's founders. "My grandfather never golfed. Glendale was a place to have parties and dinners.

"Younger members today are more interested in the golfing. They would rather spend time with their families on weekends than shmoozing in the clubhouse."

Kay said that while 70 per cent of Glendale's membership still is Jewish, "we can't be solely a Jewish club in this day and age.

"By our alliance, both Glendale and the Manitoba Club are demonstrating our doors are open to anyone who appreciates the benefits of private-club membership. We don't want to have to become a semi-private course. We want to continue to be a first-class facility."

He added that the Glendale is planning to tear down its current clubhouse and build a smaller one.

"We will host fewer and smaller tournaments, and tournament participants will be able to have dinner after the match at the Manitoba Club," he said. "We will no longer need a large dining facility."

We should talk to Hamas about its covenant

By SHLOMO AVINERI
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

Commentary

More and more voices have recently been heard saying that the only way to reach an Israeli-Palestinian accord is by talking to Hamas.

These voices are heard not only in Europe but also in the United States. New York Times columnist Roger Cohen, for example, and Brent Sowcroft, who was national security adviser to president George H.W. Bush, have said that without a dialogue with Hamas, there will be no peace between Israel and the Palestinians. And if Israel refuses to do so, the Europeans or the Americans should begin a dialogue with Hamas.

Similar statements can also be heard on the margins of Israeli politics.

I believe they are right, but not for the reasons they cite. The question is what to talk to Hamas about. It is clear we have to talk with them – and Israel does indeed speak with them indirectly – about freeing kidnapped soldier Gilad Schalit and achieving calm.

I believe we must talk to Hamas about other things, too – for example, about what is written in their founding covenant. Most Israelis, as well as the Europeans and the Americans, know that Hamas espouses the destruction of Israel. What most of them do not know is that Hamas' founding document includes a much more comprehensive criticism, not merely of Israel and Zionism, but of the Jews.

The prologue to the covenant states that Hamas' aim is a war – not against Israel or Zionism, but against the Jewish People at large – since the Jews, and not merely Israel and Zionism, are the enemies of Islam.

And in order to remove any doubt, all of Chapter 22 is devoted to detailing the iniquities of the Jews.

According to Hamas, the Jews are responsible for all the ills of modern society – the French Revolution; the Communist revolution; the establishment of secret associations (Freemasons, Rotary and Lions clubs, B'nai Brith) designed to help them gain control of the world by secret means. They control the economy, press and television; they are responsible for the outbreak of World War I, which they initiated in order to destroy the Muslim caliphates (the Ottoman Empire), to get the Balfour Declaration and set up the League of Nations with the aim of establishing their state. They also initiated World War II in order to make a fortune from selling war materials; they use both capitalism and communism as their agents.

Sound familiar? Yes, some of it is taken directly from The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, and some, particularly the parts dealing with the world wars, is original.

Don't tell me that these are merely words and Hamas must not be judged only on the basis of its covenant. Would anyone dare say that if a similar movement were to arise in Europe or America, and, in addition to making statements like these, it was busy killing Jews?

Compared with what is written in the Hamas covenant, Austria's Joerg Haider and Jean-Marie Le Pen in France are moderates.

It is clear that if a movement like this were to come out of Europe, no one would even imagine proposing that negotiations be held with it, or that it be asked to join a government. It would not merely be declared illegal but denounced by humankind. An abomination like that has no place in any political discourse.

But perhaps it is nevertheless worthwhile talking to Hamas – not about its contribution to peace, but rather about what is stated in its covenant. Perhaps those who espouse the view that we must talk with Hamas will first talk with it about these subjects? Who knows, perhaps it will change its principles. I do not expect this to happen exactly, but I am certainly curious to know what those who think Hamas is the key to peace in the Middle East will say about these things.

And perhaps they are actually correct. Perhaps Hamas is the key. If that's the case, it's difficult to expect that peace can be established in our region.

Death for selling to Jews

Palestinians who sell their property to Jews are committing a crime punishable by the death penalty, the Palestinian Authority warned. The warning about the long-standing fatwa, or religious decree, against selling property to Jews was issued after reports that American Jewish businessmen had purchased several acres of land on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem from its Palestinian owners. The PA's chief Islamic judge, Sheik Tayseer Rajab Tamimi, issued the warning, saying it also applies to real estate agents and landlords who rent to Jews. The punishment also includes being ostracized by community and family. Tamimi reportedly said that the ban is in place to prevent Israeli officials from taking control of Arab land in Jerusalem.

Palestinian kills Israeli boy

An axe-wielding Palestinian worker killed an Israeli boy and injured another in Bat Ayin. The worker began attacking the boys, aged 13 and 7, as he ran with the axe through the community of Bat Ayin, located in the Etzion bloc south of Jerusalem last week. Shlomo Nativ, the teenager, died of his injuries. The younger victim was seriously injured. The assailant struggled with a passer-by and was shot by one of the community's security guards before fleeing, Ha'aretz reported. There is no security fence around the community, apparently for ideological reasons. Israeli security services were searching the area for the assailant and checking to see if he had any accomplices. Both Islamic Jihad and the Martyrs of Imad Muginyeh claimed responsibility for the attack. Hamas called the attack a "natural reaction" to the "occupation," a spokesperson said. Government spokesperson Mark Regev condemned the attack as a "senseless act of brutality against innocents."

S. African heads Gaza inquiry

Judge Richard Goldstone of South Africa, a trustee of Hebrew University, will head the commission appointed by the United Nation's Human Rights Council. Israel did not say whether it will co-operate. It has in the past ignored other UNHRC probes, noting the body's tendency to single out Israel for criticism while ignoring other major violators. Goldstone, who headed war crimes prosecutions in Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia, said he would investigate alleged war crimes by both sides. "It's in the interest of the victims," Goldstone said in Geneva, where the UNHRC is headquartered. He said his Jewishness and ties to Israel were added values. "I believe I can approach the daunting task that I have accepted in an evenhanded and impartial manner," he said. Joining him on the commission are Christine Chinkin, a British professor of international law; Pakistani lawyer Hina Jilani, and retired Irish Army Col. Desmond Travers.

Police question Lieberman

Israel's new foreign minister was interrogated last Thursday and Friday by police just two days after his swearing-in. The Yisrael Beiteinu leader was grilled over suspicions of bribery, money laundering, fraudulent receipt of goods and breach of public trust. "Lieberman answered all of the questions put to him, and will answer any future questions," Yaron Kostelich, the foreign minister's lawyer, told the Jerusalem Post. Police said the interrogation had been co-ordinated several days in advance, and that the questioning would resume at a future date.

Creeping doubts about Olmert's ouster

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Analysis

After finally leaving office last week, Ehud Olmert will have his hands full fighting the corruption charges against him.

There is little sympathy in Israel for the outgoing prime minister, who is widely viewed as a corrupt politician who failed to achieve the lofty goals he set for himself when he took office.

But there are some nagging doubts about the system that brought down Olmert: an elected prime minister has been forced out of office even though he has yet to be found guilty of any crime.

Three major investigations against Olmert – for allegedly tampering with terms for the sale of Bank Leumi to help a friend, and receiving substantial discounts in the rental and purchase of two Jerusalem apartments in return for favours – have been closed for lack of evidence.

It's possible that Olmert was forced out of office by muckraking political opponents without his having committed any crime, Olmert confidants say.

In a mid-February interview in the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot, Olmert's wife, Aliza, implied as much, saying politically motivated people had been out to get her husband. She declined to go into detail.

Amnon Dankner, a former chief editor of the daily Ma'ariv and a close friend of Olmert, was more forthcoming.

"From the moment he placed himself as the predominant leader of the peacemaking left," Dankner wrote of Olmert in Ma'ariv last August, "right-wing elements started digging through his affairs going back down the years to produce suspicious material for the authorities."

On the face of it, Dankner's allegations seem to have merit.

Yoav Yitzhak, the investigative journalist who produced the allegations on the two Jerusalem apartments, was instrumental in bringing down another peace-leaning politician, the late president Ezer Weizman. The official who came up with the Bank Leumi allegations was then-accountant general Yaron Zelekha, who is close to Likud's Benjamin Netanyahu, a prime Olmert rival. And Moshe Talansky, the American Jewish businessman who allegedly gave Olmert envelopes stuffed with cash, and who then testified against the prime minister, has spoken of his disappointment in the once hawkish Olmert's transformation to a political dove.

The trouble with the picture of Olmert as victim, however, is that some of the allegations against him seem to carry merit: police have recommended that Olmert be indicted in three separate cases. If Olmert's political enemies found serious instances of fraud and breach of trust, what difference does it make if their initial muckraking motivation was political? Olmert's critics ask.

In two of the cases, Israel's attorney general has decided to indict Olmert pending a hearing: the Talansky affair, in which Olmert is alleged to have received hundreds of thousands of dollars in cash over a 13-year period, and the Rishon Tours affair, in which Olmert allegedly double-billed for trips and lectures he made abroad, using the excess money to finance travel by family members.

Ehud Olmert

The fact that the attorney general has decided to indict is no small matter. It means that after going through all the material, he is convinced the state has enough evidence to convict.

Indictment by the attorney general is generally considered the signal in Israel for ministers under investigation to resign. In Olmert's case, the pressure on him to step down was so great that he tendered his formal resignation last September, even before the attorney general announced his intention to indict.

Two other Olmert investigations are ongoing: awarding contracts to his former law partner Uri Messer, and appointing cronies when Olmert was minister of trade and industry from 2003 to 2006.

The sheer weight of police probes and corruption scandals with Olmert's name on them may be about to catch up with a man who long has operated under a cloud of investigations.

In 1981, Olmert received a $50,000 loan via Yehoshua Halperin, CEO of the Bank of North America, which he was never pressed to pay back. Although the circumstances suggested a possible attempt to bribe a sitting Knesset member, Olmert was not prosecuted.

In 1997, Olmert was acquitted in court of responsibility for an election scam in which Likud officials provided fictitious receipts to donors in 1988, when Olmert was the party's co-treasurer. Olmert successfully pleaded ignorance, but three other Likud officials were convicted.

In 1999, as mayor of Jerusalem, Olmert was investigated for arranging a reception for the mayor of Athens as an alleged favour to an Israeli developer seeking to build an ambitious tourist facility on a Greek island. The developer had just promised to support Olmert in an upcoming race for Likud leader. The case was dropped.

The problem facing the Israeli legal system is finding a balance between fighting corruption in high places and not allowing political opponents of incumbent politicians to abuse the system to subvert the democratic process.

Hebrew University's Shlomo Avineri, one of Israel's top political scientists, says the main problem is the slow pace of investigation. In the case of public figures, drawn-out investigations are not only unfair to the politicians, they also hamper government functioning and can pervert democracy, Avineri says. Investigations should be expedited, he says.

Some have suggested adopting the French system, under which the country's leader cannot be investigated while in office. Another possibility would be something akin to the U.S. system of impeachment: no indictment unless and until a politician is impeached by a two-thirds majority in the Knesset.

As for Olmert, he's still hoping his name will cleared – and once it is, he will find a way back to the top sooner than most people think.

Is anti-Zionisim hate?

By JUDEA PEARL

In January, at a symposium at UCLA (choreographed by the Center for Near East Studies), four longtime Israel bashers were invited to analyze the human rights conditions in Gaza and used the stage to attack the legitimacy of Zionism and its vision of a two-state solution for Israel and the Palestinians.

They criminalized Israel's existence, distorted its motives and maligned its character, its birth, even its conception. At one point, the excited audience reportedly chanted "Zionism is Nazism" and worse.

Jewish leaders condemned this hatefest as a dangerous invitation to anti-Semitic hysteria, and pointed to the chilling effect it had on UCLA students and faculty on a campus known for its open and civil atmosphere. The organizers, some of them Jewish, took refuge in "academic freedom" and the argument that anti-Zionism is not anti-Semitism.

I fully support this mantra, not because it exonerates anti-Zionists from charges of anti-Semitism but because the distinction helps us focus attention on the discriminatory, immoral and more dangerous character of anti-Zionism.

Anti-Zionism rejects the very notion that Jews are a nation – a collective bonded by a common history – and, accordingly, denies Jews the right to self-determination in their historical birthplace. It seeks the dismantling of the Jewish nation-state: Israel.

Anti-Zionism earns its discriminatory character by denying the Jewish people what it grants to other historically bonded collectives (e.g. French, Spanish, Palestinians), namely, the right to nationhood, self-determination and legitimate coexistence with other indigenous claimants.

Anti-Semitism rejects Jews as equal members of the human race; anti-Zionism rejects Israel as an equal member in the family of nations.

Are Jews a nation? Some philosophers would argue Jews are a nation first and religion second. Indeed, the narrative of Exodus and the vision of the impending journey to the land of Canaan were etched in the minds of the Jewish people before they received the Torah at Mount Sinai. But, philosophy aside, the unshaken conviction in their eventual repatriation to the birthplace of their history has been the engine behind Jewish endurance and hopes throughout their turbulent journey that started with the Roman expulsion in CE 70.

More important, shared history, not religion, is today the primary uniting force behind the secular, multi-ethnic society of Israel. The majority of its members do not practise religious laws and do not believe in divine supervision or the afterlife. The same applies to American Jewry, which is likewise largely secular. Identification with a common historical ethos, culminating in the re-establishment of the state of Israel, is the central bond of Jewish collectivity in America.

There are, of course, Jews who are non-Zionists and even anti-Zionists. The haredi cult of Neturei Karta and the leftist cult of Noam Chomsky are notable examples. The former rejects any earthly attempt to interfere with God's messianic plan, while the latter abhors all forms of nationalism, especially successful ones.

There are also Jews who find it difficult to defend their identity against the growing viciousness of anti-Israel propaganda, and eventually hide, disown or denounce their historical roots in favour of social acceptance and other expediencies.

But these are marginal minorities at best; the vital tissues of Jewish identity today feed on Jewish history and its natural derivatives – the state of Israel, its struggle for survival, its cultural and scientific achievements and its relentless drive for peace.

Given this understanding of Jewish nationhood, anti-Zionism is in many ways more dangerous than anti-Semitism.

First, anti-Zionism targets the most vulnerable part of the Jewish people, namely, the Jewish population of Israel, whose physical safety and personal dignity depend crucially on maintaining Israel's sovereignty. Put bluntly, the anti-Zionist plan to do away with Israel condemns 5-1/2 million human beings, mostly refugees or children of refugees, to eternal defenselessness in a region where genocidal designs are not uncommon.

Secondly, modern society has developed antibodies against anti-Semitism but not against anti-Zionism. Today, anti-Semitic stereotypes evoke revulsion in most people of conscience, while anti-Zionist rhetoric has become a mark of academic sophistication and social acceptance in certain extreme yet vocal circles of U.S. academia and media elite. Anti-Zionism disguises itself in the cloak of political debate, exempt from sensitivities and rules of civility that govern inter-religious discourse, to attack the most cherished symbol of Jewish identity.

Finally, anti-Zionist rhetoric is a stab in the back to the Israeli peace camp, which overwhelmingly stands for a two-state solution. It also gives credence to enemies of coexistence who claim that the eventual elimination of Israel is the hidden agenda of every Palestinian.

It is anti-Zionism, then, not anti-Semitism that poses a more dangerous threat to lives, historical justice and the prospects of peace in the Middle East.

Study cites dramatic rise in anti-Semitic attacks in Europe

By ASSAF UNI
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The number of anti-Semitic incidents in Europe through the first three months of this year exceeds the total number of such occurrences in all of 2008, according to a report issued by the European Jewish Congress.

The findings were announced by EJC president Moshe Kantor during a special session of the European Parliament devoted to the subject of anti-Semitism on the continent.

The report cites the reaction to this past January's Israel Defence Forces operation in Gaza as one of the key triggers of anti-Semitic attacks against Jewish communities in Europe. In addition, the current financial crisis is giving rise to age-old anti-Semitic stereotypes suggesting "Jewish control of the global financial system."

EJC members from all over Europe who gathered in Brussels for the special session reported a significant rise in the number of anti-Semitic incidents. The head of official Jewry in Finland, Rony Smolar, said that the 25,000-strong Jewish community living in the Scandinavian countries is subject to repeated harassment due to its support for Israel.

"Public opinion links Israel with the local Jewish community, which turns us into enemies," Smolar said, adding that his country has seen "a dramatic rise" in the number and severity of anti-Semitic attacks.

Smolar said that Molotov cocktails have been thrown into synagogues and Jewish cemeteries in Sweden and Norway have been vandalized. He also cited a shooting incident in which two Israelis were wounded by a gunman in Denmark during Israel's Gaza operation.

"Cartoons likening the Star of David to the Nazi swastika have become commonplace in Scandinavia," Smolar said.

Richard Prasquier, head of the umbrella organization representing the Jewish community in France (CRIF), also pointed to a rise in anti-Semitic incidents.

"France is home to the largest Jewish community in Europe and the largest Muslim community in Europe," Prasquier said, hinting that the sizable immigrant community from North Africa is most responsible for instigating the anti-Jewish violence. European politicians have shied away from blaming Muslim immigrants for attacks against Jews.

The EU's human rights arm, the FRA, told the gathering that increases in anti-Semitism have been reported in Holland, Belgium, France, and Britain. An organization representative said the reasons for the phenomenon must be studied and examined.

Peter Feldmeier, head of the Jewish community in Hungary, said that anti-Semitism in his country still features historical overtones "as we knew them in the interwar years."

While noting that "there is barely a Muslim community in Hungary," Feldmeier brandished a copy of a widely circulated newspaper affiliated with a far-right party. The paper made waves after featuring on its cover a Hungarian politician bearing a fictitious yellow Star of David. The paper demanded that the politician admit to his Jewish roots.

Janet Rosenberg Jagan, ex-Guyana president, dies

JTA

MIAMI — Janet Rosenberg Jagan, Guyana's only female president and one of the few Jewish heads of state in Caribbean history, has died.

Janet Rosenberg Jagan

Rosenberg, a veteran politician and co-founder of Guyana's People's Progressive Party, died March 28 from an abdominal aneurysm. She was 88.

She was believed to be the only Jew living in Guyana, a nation of 740,000 dominated by Hindus and Muslims of East Indian descent, and Christians of African origin.

Her husband, Cheddi Jagan, was elected president in 1992, and she took over the job shortly after his death in 1997. She resigned after nearly two years in office because of a heart attack.

Jagan was given a state funeral March 31 in Georgetown, the capital city. President Bharrat Jagdeo cut short his official visit to the Middle East to attend.

Born into a middle-class Chicago Jewish family, Jagan was a product of the Great Depression. At age 22, while a nursing student at Cook County Hospital in Chicago, she fell in love with Cheddi Jagan, a dental student from British Guiana. Against the wishes of both families, the couple married and moved to Georgetown.

Their involvement in leftist politics landed both in jail, though in 1966 the Jagans helped win independence for Guyana, an English-speaking nation that is geographically in South America but considers itself culturally and politically part of the Caribbean.

"Cheddi and I always believed in socialism," Jagan told JTA in an exclusive interview three years ago. "To us that meant getting rid of oppression so the poor man could get out of poverty and enjoy the fruits of this country."

Despite her worsening diabetes and other ailments, however, Jagan continued to work at the party headquarters nearly up until the time of her death.

Jagan's daughter, Nadira Jagan-Brancier, is a jeweller in Milton, Ont.

U.S. seeks to join UN Human Rights Council

JTA

NEW YORK — The United States will seek to join the UN Human Rights Council.

This reverses its policy of shunning the group and has prompted concern among some Jewish organizations.

The Obama administration announced, on March 31, that it would participate in May elections for a seat on the 47-member council, "with the goal of working to make it a more effective body to promote and protect human rights." The Bush administration had withheld U.S. membership from the Geneva-based council for its failure to confront human rights abusers and its singling out of Israel for condemnation.

"The United States helped to found the United Nations and retains a vital stake in advancing that organization's genuine commitment to the human rights values that we share with other member nations," U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said in a statement announcing the decision.

JTA has learned that top State Department officials briefed Jewish organizational leaders about the decision in a conference call on March 31.

Since its creation in 2006 to replace the widely discredited UN Commission on Human Rights, the council has passed 32 resolutions; 26 have been critical of Israel, according to UN Watch, a pro-Israel monitoring group based in Geneva. More than half of the council's members fall short of basic democracy standards, according to Freedom House, a democracy watchdog group. And in the past two years, the council has moved to eliminate its country-specific special experts investigating human rights abuses in Darfur, Congo, Cuba, Belarus and Liberia.

"Those who suffer from abuse and oppression around the world, as well as those who dedicate their lives to advancing human rights, need the council to be balanced and credible," said Susan Rice, the U.S. ambassador to the UN. "The U.S. is seeking election to the council because we believe that working from within, we can make the council a more effective forum to promote and protect human rights. We hope to work in partnership with many countries to achieve a more effective council."

> 'The Human Rights Council has deep systemic flaws'

The Anti-Defamation League expressed concern about the Obama administration's decision.

"There is no question that the U.S. can play a decisive role in making UN institutions more effective, but the Human Rights Council has deep systemic flaws," said Abraham Foxman, the group's national director. "We remain concerned that the U.S. decision to join the council before meaningful reforms are put into motion may not achieve this desired goal."

Democratic congressman Howard Berman, the most senior Jewish lawmaker in the U.S. House of Representatives and chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, supported the decision.

"The time is ripe to take a more positive and active role in challenging the council and in speaking out about genuine human rights atrocities," Berman said in a statement.

"In two years, the Human Rights Council faces a mandated five-year review. By participating in the process as a member of the council, the Obama administration can begin working to bring about a much-needed overhaul."

The World Jewish Congress (WJC) wondered whether the time was ripe for joining the council.

"There are so many players on the Human Rights Council that do not have our interests at heart that I think it will mobilize against the things that the United States is going to fight for," said WJC spokeswoman Betty Ehrenberg. "I'm not sure at this moment that the Human Rights Council is free enough of its past and present difficulties and complications to make this effort fruitful at this moment."

The executive director of UN Watch, Hillel Neuer, said he welcomes the U.S. decision, "but only if it's to vigorously push back against the world's worst abusers."

He added, "The council is worse than ever before, pathologically obsessed with scapegoating Israel while turning a blind eye to millions of human rights victims around the world."

A family history on the Jews of Kurdistan

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Walter Fischel, an American academic, visited the Jews of Kurdistan in the 1940s. "Such Jews," he exclaimed with a sense of wonder. "Men virile and wild-looking. Women wearing embroidered turbans, earrings, bracelets, even ring-noses, and with symbols tattooed into their faces…"

Roughly 25,000 Jews lived in Kurdistan back then, 18,000 in Iraq and the rest in Iran, Syria and Turkey.

Largely illiterate but famous as gifted storytellers and speaking the ancient language of Aramaic, Kurdish Jews were found in some 200 Muslim villages and towns throughout the Middle East on the eve of Israel's establishment.

Ariel Sabar, an American journalist, has more than a passing knowledge of this exotic Jewish community, most of whose members immigrated to Israel in the early 1950s.

Ariel Sabar

Sabar, in My Father's Paradise: A Son's Search for His Jewish Past in Kurdish Iraq (Algonquin Books), produces a family history and a portrait of Kurdish Jews in this richly documented volume.

As the title suggests, the book turns on his father, Yona, a linguist, researcher and professor of Hebrew at the University of California in Los Angeles.

Born in the northern Iraqi town of Zakho, in the heart of Iraq's Kurdish region, but raised in Israel, Yona Sabar has published more than 90 monographs and two books on Aramaic – a nearly extinct language today – and the folklore of Kurdish Jews.

Despite his father's international reputation as a scholar, Sabar did not appreciate his accomplishments and was even ashamed of him.

"I swore horribly in front of him, ridiculed him behind his back and took pains to avoid him, to be nothing like him," he readily admits.

Sabar, who was born in Los Angeles, wanted to be part of what he describes as "the California mainstream," and since his father rejected that ethos, father and son, like oil and water, did not mix.

"When we collided, it wasn't pretty," he writes in this frank and pungent memoir. "I threw tantrums and unleashed hailstorms of four-letter words. He stewed privately over how any son could behave that way toward his father, then consoled himself with the hypothesis that this was how children were in America."

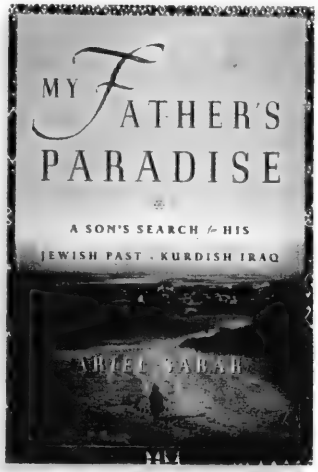
The cultural clash he alludes to forms but a segment of the core of My Father's Paradise. In the final pages, Sabar comes to terms with him as he reclaims his heritage and visits Zakho.

The Jews of Zakho lived among 26,000 Kurdish Muslims and were concentrated in the mahala Juheeya, the oldest district, on an island on the Habur River. "Their mud-brick houses lined narrow alleys that zigzagged down to the river," Sabar writes.

Since they were so isolated, they spoke Aramaic, the lingua franca of the Middle East until Arab armies from Arabia conquered Mesopotamia in the 17th century.

By all accounts, Jews and Kurds lived in harmony until Israel's creation in 1948. To the Jews of Zakho, Sabar observes, Zionism represented, among other things, hopes for a better life and unease over the breakdown of Jewish-Muslim relations.

The first Jews to make aliyah were the have-nots – the small peddlers, the porters, the beggars. "Most carried only the rags on their backs and perhaps a single clay bowl," says Sabar.



Once Sabar's family was ready to leave in 1951, the Iraqi government passed a law that cancelled the citizenship and froze all the assets and property of departing Jews.

Sabar's father was 13 years old when he and his parents and siblings left the country of their ancestors.

"The end arrived suddenly," Sabar writes. "A line of motor coaches rolled into town early one April morning, and word went out that the time had come. Under a sky still full of stars, Jewish families, anxious and bleary, dragged suitcases and children out front doors and into cramped alleys that led to the main street."

Hundreds of Kurds bid farewell to their Jewish neighbours, but the atmosphere was very different in Baghdad. "At the airport, angry mobs pressed against the barricades, hurling curses."

Life was hard for Sabar's family in Jerusalem, particularly for his grandmother: "Her relatives bought her a washing machine and stove, but the controls confounded her… She trudged off to night classes to learn Hebrew, but quit in frustration after two years, scarcely able to distinguish the letters of the alphabet. She had never learned to read or write her mother tongue. Why did people think she could master a second language?"

Sabar's father, Yona, was more adaptable. A good student, he graduated from the Hebrew University with a BA in Hebrew and Arabic. Nevertheless, he felt that Kurdish Jews were patronized by the Ashkenazi elite, and he wondered whether he could pursue a scholarly career in Israel.

He was thus only too pleased to accept a scholarship from Yale University, where he plumbed the depths of Aramaic and met his wife.

In 1972, a year before Sabar was born, he was offered a position at the University of California. And there he thrived.

"The Promised Land had been a disappointment," Sabar writes in a reference to Israel. "It had broken his father and his grandfather. It had humiliated and infantilized his mother. A generation of Kurdish Jews had been spit on by a society that should have known better."

Yona Sabar's success as an up-and-coming scholar did not spoil him, but his plain, unpretentious mien, his cheap clothes and his malapropisms in English alienated his insecure son.

"I didn't know it as a boy, but he was almost single-handedly turning the field of Neo-Aramaic from a marginal curiosity to one commanding serious and growing attention at major academic conferences," Sabar adds.

After Sabar himself became a father, he learned to value his father and his achievements and quit his job so that he could explore the lost world of Iraqi Kurdish Jews on a spiritual journey.

Having convinced his father to accompany him, the pair set off. They arrived in Zakho after Iraq's dictator, Saddam Hussein, was unseated by the United States and its allies.

To Sabar, the purpose of the trip was crystal clear: "We could repair our relationship over cups of cardamom tea at cafés by the Habur River. We could walk together through the streets of the old Jewish neighbourhood, summoning the spirits of our ancestors… He would at last see me for the better son I had become."

And so, as Sabar relates in this intriguing book, father and son finally bonded.

Toronto native's guide to American Jewish fiction includes classics and forgotten gems

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Toronto native Josh Lambert hopes his book, a collection of short synopses meant to introduce readers to 125 American Jewish fiction titles, will help people get a better "sense of the texture of Jewish life."

Lambert, who spent two years compiling a concise handbook on works written over a span of 140 years, likes to think of his book as a Zagat guide for American Jewish fiction.

"When I was in touch with the people of the Jewish Publication Society, and I decided I would do the book, what excited me about doing it was covering a wide range of American Jewish texts and giving readers a sense of how broad that tradition is and how widely it ranges through history and subject matter," said 29-year-old Lambert, a Harvard graduate who is finishing his PhD in Jewish literature from the University of Michigan.

The works – by authors including Franz Kafka, Norman Mailer, Judy Blume, Chaim Potok, John Updike, Michael Chabon and Jonathan Safran Foer – covered in American Jewish Fiction: A JPS Guide delve into issues including immigration, assimilation, intermarriage, politics, the Holocaust and Israel.

Lambert said he hates the idea of "best 100 novels of all time" lists in any tradition.

"To me, that seems so silly because people's tastes are so different and books don't appeal to everyone in the same way. I covered some books that I actually don't even like, but are meaningful and important within the Jewish tradition," said Lambert, who has worked as the editor of the online book review magazine, JBooks.com and contributes regularly to newspapers including the San Francisco Chronicle and the Globe and Mail.

He added that when he started working on the project in 2006, he put together a master list of about 350 books. From 350, Lambert slowly whittled the list down to 125 by eliminating books that overlapped on the themes of others.

"My real goal was to give a sense of the diversity and breadth of the field."

Lambert said it was important to him to author this guide because, having grown up in the Toronto Jewish community, and having come out of the Jewish day school system, he felt a strong connection to his heritage.

"It is something that I'm very connected to. I think what draws me to studying Jewish literature particularly is the way that literature both embraces the Jewish tradition of textual study, of scholarship, but also modern literature is open to innovation," he said.

"It's open, not just to the elite of the Jewish people, which is what you get with rabbinic texts, but you get the way that Jews of all kinds live in modern Jewish literature. You get a sense of the texture of Jewish life."

Lambert said that one issue he struggled with was whether he should include Canadian Jewish writers in his book.

"I feel bad... that I didn't include Canadian Jewish writers in my book, despite having grown up in Canada and loving Canadian Jewish writers," he said.

"I know Canadians hate when you have an American collection and there are just a few Canadians, so I hope no one is offended that I didn't include Canadians, but it's because I think the writers deserve an entire book of their own, which I may decide to write at some point."

Lambert said that writing this guide opened his eyes to new personal favourites.

"My all-time favourites are the works of Philip Roth, and he gets four entries in my book, which is more than anyone else, so I guess that's a sign of how much I like him," he said.

"But one of my advisers recommended that I include Steven Millhauser's Edwin Mullhouse, which I think is a tremendously good novel and a novel that few people think of as a Jewish book. [It's] fascinatingly subtle and intricate on the question of Jewishness, so I was really excited about that one."

Another one of Lambert's new favourites is Vera Caspary's Thicker Than Water, a novel about a Sephardi Jewish family in Chicago that covers 50 years of the family's history.

"I really made an effort to foreground those books that don't just tell the story about immigration, working in a sweatshop, succeeding, moving to a suburb and becoming a doctor or a lawyer," Lambert said.

"Jewish Cowboy is about trying to make a living as an agricultural worker in the West. There are novels going back to the late '20s and '40s about Jewish gays and lesbians trying to make that identity work. There are stories about strong women, pushing against the strictures of a patriarchal culture."

He said that reading those stories not only gives readers a sense of the Jewish experience throughout history, but an opportunity to see ourselves in that history through our own struggles and experiences.

"There are so many new books coming out every year, and it can be easy to get wrapped up in what's happening now," he said.

"I think to connect with the classic books or with books that have been forgotten about can give a real rich sense, not just of what is happening now, but of recent Jewish history."

Children's book profiles Canadian heroes

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Children's author Rona Arato wants her most recent book to teach Canadian children about homegrown heroes they can look up to.

Courage and Compassion: Ten Canadians Who Made a Difference profiles ten Canadians whose commitment to human rights led them to work on ways of improving the country and the world.

"I wanted [to profile] people who had worked at a grassroots level... who saw a situation that needed to be handled and they got out and did the job," said Arato, a writer, editor and educator.

The 10 men, women and children featured in the book – Jeanne Mance, Josiah Henson, Nellie McClung, Lester B. Pearson, Roger Obata, June Callwood, Judy Feld Carr, Elijah Harper, Craig Kielburger and Hannah Taylor – represent a diversity of ages, ethnicities, backgrounds.

"I wanted to go through every period of Canadian history... I wanted to represent different groups that have lived in Canada. Asian, Jewish, black communities, as well as the Native community. I wanted different age groups, I wanted to show that there were children who have also been very influential," said Arato, who became interested in writing children's books about 10 years ago.

Arato, an American-native who taught in elementary schools before moving to Toronto in 1970, said she started her writing career with The CJN.

She went on to write for other publications and eventually dabbled in corporate writing.

When Arato was presented with the opportunity to be an interviewer for Steven Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah project in 1994, she realized that promoting human rights was something she wanted to do with her life.

"I did interviews for about four years. I did about 120 interviews with Holocaust survivors. That was one of the things that fuelled my desire to write about human rights. After doing that, I wasn't happy doing just corporate work anymore. I really wanted to do something that had more meaning."

Rona Arato

In 2001, Arato worked on a project for B'nai Brith Canada called Taking Action Against Hate in 2001. This, she said, further pushed her to pursue a career as a children's author that promoted human rights.

Since then, Arato has authored seven books including Ice Cream Town, a junior fiction novel about a Jewish immigrant in New York City, and is currently working on Mrs. Kaputnik's Pool Hall and Matzo Ball Emporium, a story about a Russian Jewish family that comes to New York in 1890 with their pet dragon.

Although those titles do promote tolerance and diversity, Courage and Compassion takes a more direct approach to humanitarianism by focusing on people Canadian children can be proud of.

"I felt that Canadian children don't have heroes, don't have homegrown heroes to look up to. When they learn history, they don't learn about Canadians who have been influential or Canadians who have been active in human rights in the ways that we did when I was growing up in the States," Arato said.

The profiles in Courage and Compassion are in chronological order. Arato begins the book with Mance, a co-founder of Montreal who lived in the 17th century.

"She was a nurse and... she started the first hospital [in Montreal]. She believed that everyone deserved the right to health care, and she was active in ensuring that anyone who lived there would have the same rights," Arato said.

Henson, a black slave, fascinated her so much that she was inspired to write a separate book about him titled Working for Freedom: The Story of Josiah Henson.

"He not only came up through the Underground Railroad [to Canada] with his wife and children, but once he came here and began to do well, he wanted to help other blacks who were escaping," she said.

He established a group called the Dawn Community in Dresden, Ont., where he built a vocational school so that former slaves and their children could acquire skills and own land.

Arato also wanted to turn attention to a Canadian Jewish woman, Feld Carr, who rescued more than 3,000 Syrian Jews.

"She ran a clandestine network for 28 years that no one knew about, buying and smuggling and bringing Syrian Jews out and bringing them to Israel, the United States and Canada."

Arato added that she made a point of including younger humanitarians – Kielburger, the Thornhill native who started the humanitarian organization, Save the Children, when he was 12 years old and Hannah Taylor who started collecting money for the homeless when she was just five years old – to show children that they're not powerless to make positive changes.

"I hope they'll take away the message that if they see a situation that needs to be handled that they can make a difference," Arato said. "They can stand up for a classmate that is being bullied, they can help a new child who is an immigrant who doesn't speak the language, they can help a friend who is struggling with a subject."

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL OPENS APRIL 18 WITH ARGENTINE FILM CAMERA OBSCURA

One of the major events in the city's Jewish calendar, the 17th annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival opens Saturday, April 18, at 9:15 p.m. with a screening of Camera Obscura, an understated romance from Argentina about a Jewish immigrant born on the docks as her parents' ship arrives in Buenos Aires at the dawn of the 20th century.

Camera Obscura opens the 2009 Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Made by director Maria Victoria Menis, Camera Obscura is one of 90 films from 23 countries – including Australia, Belgium, Chile, France, Germany, India, Ireland, Israel, Kazakhstan, Peru, Russia, Switzerland and United States – to be shown at this year's festival, demonstrating once again the vitality of Jewish cinematic creativity on a global scale.

The festival runs through April 26, when legendary novelist-screenwriter Budd Schulberg, now 95 years old, may be present at a screening of What Makes Sammy Run?, a recently restored 1959 television drama adapted from his 1947 novel about a ruthless Hollywood hustler. A lost treasure until a missing reel was discovered four years ago, prompting a full restoration, the teleplay stars John Forsythe, Barbara Rush and Norman Fell, and includes an interview with Schulberg.

Israeli director Yariv Mozer is scheduled to receive the second annual David A. Stein Memorial Award, worth $5,000, for his documentary My First War, a first-hand look at Israeli soldiers of the Second Lebanon War. The film is being shown at the Al Green Theatre on Sunday, April 19, at 3:30 p.m. and again Sunday, April 26, at 2 p.m.

Broadway and movie musicals come into sharp focus with Gotta Sing, Gotta Dance: Songwriters of the Musicals, a series of eight documentaries and seven classic musical features showcasing the work of Richard Rodgers, Lorenz Hart, Alan Jay Lerner and Frederick Loewe, Betty Comden and Adolph Green, Stephen Sondheim, Harold Arlen and Frank Loesser, among others.

The festival's "Toonie" Tuney Films offer the best of Broadway musicals at a very affordable price of $2. Tickets may be purchased in person on the day-of at any festival box office.

As expected, the cinematic offerings vary widely in theme, from the domestic to the political, sports to the sexual revolution. Subject matters include dance, family, bad guys, sex and baseball. Several films explore various aspects of Jewish identity in France, including Cycles, Father's Footsteps, Villa Jasmin and Being Jewish in France, the latter touted as "a monumental, engrossing doc poised to become the definitive work on the topic."

As always, the festival offers several free events. Films are screened at three venues, the Bloor Street Cinema, the Al Green Theatre of the Miles Nadal JCC, and the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Grande Cinemas at Yonge and Sheppard.

The Most Flexible Pass offers admission to 20 films, excluding opening night, and costs $140. The Weekday Special Pass, for daytime films Monday to Friday, is $60. The full schedule of films is available at the website, www.tjff.com. For further information, contact the box office at 416-967-1528.

Toronto Jewish Film Festival offers an eclectic selection

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

This year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival runs from April 18 to 26 and is bigger and better than ever. Here is a sampler of its eclectic films. Visit www.tjff.com for more information.

My First War (Sunday, April 19, 3:30 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre) focuses on the 2006 Second Lebanon War from the perspective of Yariv Mozer, a junior Israeli army officer who also happens to be the director.

When he was called up, Mozer packed a video camera into his knapsack, and the images and sounds he captures are searingly honest and cinéma vérité as its best. The soldiers in his regiment, who are stationed in a serene plum orchard opposite the volatile Lebanese border, reveal their innermost fears, concerns and critiques of the war. They speak of contradictory orders and disorganization and voice respect for the tough and disciplined Hezbollah fighters. A senior officer admits to being frustrated because Israel cannot stop the incessant rain of Hezbollah rockets.

My First War: War at its ugliest.

Mozer himself is is also critical. He describes the war as a "useless" one that leaves him with an "indisputable feeling" of defeat. He complains that his fellow soldiers are "sitting ducks." He thinks that the last 48 hours of the war, during which 33 troops were killed, were unnecessary. He claims that the generals hid their "incompetence" at the expense of "heroic" soldiers.

The images are stark: tanks open fire and missiles are launched. In addition, the camera pans on cars that have taken a direct hit and on an apartment building that has a gaping hole on its side.

This is war at its ugliest.

Amos Oz (Sunday, April 19, 10 a.m. at the Al Green Theatre), by Greek filmmaker Stelios Charalampopoulos, is a sympathetic and empathetic profile of a major Israeli novelist.

Oz talks about an array of interlocking topics – his home in Arad, his themes, his writing methods, his family background, his parents' devotion to European culture, his mother's suicide, his father's intellectual bent and facility with languages, his former homes in Kibbutz Hulda and Jerusalem, his beloved wife, his engagement with politics, his revulsion of violence and his desire for peace with the Palestinians.

Visiting Greece in the company of the director, he waxes nostalgic about the Jewish community of Salonika, which was largely decimated by the Nazis during the Holocaust.

Oz, in this documentary, emerges as an eloquent and reflective person.

Amos Oz is the subject of a sympathetic profile.

Po-Lin: The Slivers of Memory is a film to savour.

Po-Lin: The Slivers of Memory (Tuesday, April 21, 2:30 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre), by Polish director Jolanta Dylewska, lovingly preserves the shtetls of Poland through home movies shot in the 1920s and '30s. Composed of flickering images and sombre commentary, mixed in with revealing talking heads of aging Poles who lived with Jews, this is a film to savour.

The remarkable footage, taken from such towns as Gabin, Slonim, Kurow and Boryslaw, drips with nostalgia, bringing back venerable rabbis, smiling young couples, carefree children, blushing women, a crowded market, a water carrier straining under a load and a band in full throttle. A clip of a visiting American Jew is particularly interesting.

In a hushed tone, the narrator delivers a moving eulogy on Polish Jews and their institutions, synagogues, holidays and customs. Poles old enough to remember the past recall their Jewish friends and acquaintances. "Theirs was a different world," a woman says, distilling to the core of the matter.

On the whole, Dylewska strikes a positive tone. To her credit, she also deals with the dark underside of Polish-Jewish relations.

In Search of the Bene Israel (Tuesday, April 21, 5:30 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema) turns on an ancient Jewish community in India, centred in Mumbai, that has been vastly depleted by emigration since Indian independence. The director, Sadia Shepard, has a personal stake in the story. Her grandmother, who married a Muslim and lived in Pakistan for some years, was a Bene Israel herself. Shepard, an inquisitive guide, relates the community's storied history and meets a few of its members, including an Israel-bound couple, a movie director exploring her roots and an oil presser, the last of his breed.

The Fire Within: Jews of the Amazonian Rainforest (Tuesday, April 21, immediately after In Search of the Bene Israel), by Lorry Salcedo Mitrani, delves into the figurative heart of darkness, the trackless jungles of Brazil and Peru. From the late 19th century until 1912, a procession of young, adventurous Moroccan Jewish men went to South America, galvanized by the rubber boom and hoping to strike it rich.

When the market collapsed, most of these adventurers returned to their homes, but some stayed behind and married local Indian women. Their fourth- and fifth-generation descendants are the subject of this fascinating movie, which is set mainly in the ragged but exotic town of Iquitos, Peru.

The film explores two themes: the campaign they wage to be accepted as Jews by the hidebound Jewish community in Lima and their decision to settle in Israel as new immigrants.

King Lati the First (Friday, April 24, 10 a.m. at the Al Green Theatre) is odd and absorbing, a testament to naieveté and misplaced hope. Uri Bar-On's offbeat documentary revolves around a Senegalese Muslim worker in Israel, Aziz Diouf, and his eight-year-old son, Lati, whom he is grooming for greatness. Aziz, an earnest, well-intentioned man married to a half-Jewish blond Russian, fervently believes that Lati can lay claim to the throne of his tribe in Senegal. Irina, his wife, is skeptical, but Aziz pushes on.

In pursuit of this far-fetched goal, the family travels to Aziz's poor, decrepit village, but the path to the throne is littered with obstacles and cultural chasms. Bar-On's final scene, in Israel, is a triumph of irony.

Camera Obscura (Saturday, April 18, 9:15 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema) comes straight from Argentina. An inventive blend of live action, animation and still photography, Maria Menis' unusual feature film, which takes place primarily on an isolated farm on the pampas, is about immigration, family bonds, solitude, the perception of beauty and the transformational effects of photography.

Visit the Mauricie for a different kind of holiday

By LAUREN KRAMER
CJN Pacific Correspondent

With its timber log construction, Hotel Sacacomie has become a favourite among European visitors, who view the lodge as quintessentially Canadian. [Enrique Escalona photo]

You can commute around the Mauricie by vehicle, but for speed, efficiency and views, there's no beating the seaplane as the best means of transportation. [Enrique Escalona photo]

If there are modern-day Québécois explorers, or coureurs du bois as they were termed in Canadian folklore, Raymond des Rosiers is one of them. For the 44-year-old guide at Auberge St. Alexis des Monts in Quebec, his favourite time of year is October, when, for two weeks, he douses himself in animal urine, lays salt blocks on the ground and wakes at 4 a.m. to race to his tree hideout deep in the forest. The reason? Moose.

"My hunting buddy and I have only caught two in the past 10 years," the former trapper says. But despite the highly uncertain odds of a kill and the $800 he's spent on permits over the last decade, des Rosiers keeps coming back for the thrill of the hunt. A bullet in a moose is testament to extreme patience and perseverance. Plus, it means great-tasting meat for a year, he says.

I'm in the terrain of trappers, the Quebec interior known as the Mauricie. It's a plane-shaped swath of land that stretches between Quebec City and Montreal. It's fair to say that most of the 71,000 Jews who live in Montreal – Canada's second-largest Jewish population – don't venture this way, where the landscape is heavily forested, its lush mass of trees broken only by the 17,500 lakes that dot the region.

Here, the forested Laurentian mountains rise and dip as they have for centuries, with no one but the black bears and elusive moose to pay them heed. Peppered with charming French villages, the land is a playground for hunters, fishers and outdoor enthusiasts who come to escape city life and embrace the wide open spaces.

Lac-à-l'Eau-Claire looks like a sheet of glass on the day I step on board a seaplane, and as we teeter into the sky, the vastness of the Mauricie is laid bare in minutes. From 2,000 feet, you can fully comprehend the rich vegetation that spreads with abandon across the land. Multiple beaver dams testify to hours of tireless work by Canada's furry national symbols, more than a million of which make their home in Quebec. And hundreds of clear, fresh lakes carve liquid shapes into the landscape, boggling the mind with the sheer quantity of pure water.

Within 15 minutes, we descend onto Lake Sacacomie, on the verge of which sits the rustic log timbers of the Hotel Sacacomie. The hotel offers a variety of recreational options, but its beaver and bear trips have become a firm favourite, giving guests a glimpse of the local wildlife.

That's how I find myself in the company of another modern-day explorer, Marian McMurray.

Formerly a trapper, the sun-wizened McMurray traded in his gun some years ago after watching the price of pelt drop consistently. Though he was once a voracious beaver hunter, in 2002 he befriended a pair of beavers at a nearby dam, affectionately naming them Charlie and Charlotte. Ironically, he now guides educational visits to their habitat, where he teaches wide-eyed visitors about the beavers' lives.

The beaver duo must be blissfully unaware of McMurray's past, for when he arrives brandishing their favourite treat – a few branches of Trembling Aspen – Charlie shows up immediately. Without a hint of fear, he swims across the dam toward the outstretched hand and gingerly snaps off the leafy end of the branch before making his way back across the water.

Not far from Hotel Sacacomie, visitors can watch black bears pawing corn and molasses from a rusty old drum, a daily offering from hotel staff to keep the bears coming back. The bears are fed for the entertainment and "wildlife experience" of daily carloads of delighted tourists.

Like a loyal dog, Charlie can be relied on to show up every night for this treat, a whiskered face with black eyes that implicitly trust the leathery ex-trapper. Twice he approaches the shore for his treat, and the third time, when an on-shore performance is required of him, he clambers up from the water's edge, grabs his branch and plunges back in.

A bear-viewing hut is our next stop, and on this summer night, instant gratification awaits, for both the bears and the guests. We arrive to see two of them mesmerized by the metal drum placed on a site 200 metres from the viewing hut and filled daily with a mixture of corn and molasses. By sticking their paw through a hole in the drum, the bears are able to extract the food they covet, and it keeps them occupied for hours.

As the cameras begin to click and the mosquitoes feast on exposed, sunburned skin, I'm wondering about the environmental friendliness of this scene. Yes, I reflect, it's better than seeing the animals in a zoo. But at what expense, I can't help but wonder.

If you go:

- Lac-à-l'Eau-Claire (www.lacaleauclaire.com) 819-265-3187
- You can reach the Mauricie region from Montreal or Quebec City, and the best way to go is by seaplane. For more information, contact Tourisme Mauricie at www.tourisme-mauricie.com or call 800-567-7603.

PA expels orchestra founder over concert for survivors

By YOAV STERN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Wafa Younis, a musician from northern Israel who founded a youth orchestra in the Jenin refugee camp, was arrested there last week by Fatah militants and sent back to Israel from the West Bank. Last week the orchestra played for Holocaust survivors and elderly Arabs in Holon, news that ignited passions in Jenin.

Younis had been meeting with students' mothers when about four armed men in civilian clothing surrounded her. The militants were led by Zakariya Zubeidi, head of Fatah in the camp, who demanded that Younis go with him in his car to the camp's police station.

"The police chief, who is familiar with my activities, said he would prefer that I leave, because those are the instructions regarding anyone with an Israeli identification card," Younis told Ha'aretz last Thursday.

"Zubeidi offered a hudna, where we would suspend our activities for a time, and I agreed. I'll return to Jenin at the right moment, because the children are waiting for me, because the community is waiting for me. And if I can't teach them in their classroom, I'll teach them in the centre I founded in A'ara [where she lives]."

Younis' work in the camp has made her a household name there. After teaching more than a dozen schoolchildren to play the violin, oud, drums and other instruments, she arranged performances in Israel for the orchestra, Strings of Freedom.

A year ago, it played in A'ara for the families of Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, Israeli soldiers who were seized in a cross-border raid and taken to Lebanon, and of Palestinian prisoners held in Israel.

Later in the week, after the arrest, PA officials said they and Fatah were under heavy pressure from Hamas members in the camp as a result of the concerts.

"On the Internet, there are pictures of the children under photos of the Israeli prisoners, and they performed for Holocaust survivors," one Fatah official said. "Hamas accused us of normalization activities, of identifying with the enemy, so we were forced to expel Younis. The subject is now closed."

Younis, who was interviewed by Arab and foreign news outlets, told Ha'aretz that she would appeal directly to the office of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. "I'll ask him to appoint a genuine commission of inquiry that will hear the children and their parents, too," she said. "I will wait until the issue is thrashed out, because I cannot continue my work with these interruptions."

Gala raises $250,000 for Maccabi athletes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Some 450 young Canadian athletes and another 50 coaches and medical staff will be heading to the 18th Maccabiah Games in Israel this summer, thanks in part to funds raised at a gala dinner in Toronto last week.

An estimated $250,000 was raised at the dinner and through an online silent auction, which runs until April 16 (http://auction.maccabicanada.com). The funds will be used to subsidize the $7,500 cost of sending each athlete to the Games ($3.4 million for the team). Athletes and coaches raise a portion themselves.

The Maccabiah Games are held every four years in Israel and bring together Jewish athletes in what is considered the third-largest athletic event in the world. Over 8,000 athletes from more than 50 countries will be in Israel for the Games, which run from July 12 to 23.

About 280 people gathered at Toronto's Liberty Grand ballroom for the dinner, which included a performance by legendary funnyman Jackie Mason.

Canada will field the third-largest delegation, after Israel and the United States, said Allen Gerskup, president of Maccabi Canada. The games not only provide a venue for athletic achievement, but they also promote the Jewish identity of participants, create lifelong friendships and forge a strong bond with Israel. For most of the athletes, the 18th Games will mark their first trip to Israel, Gerskup said.

Gerskup has been to Israel at least 25 times since 1985, thanks to his association with the Maccabi movement. His proudest moment, he said, came in 2001, as the intifadah was raging. That year, the games came perilously close to being postponed.

Under the watchful eye of Israeli security, the international athletes marched into Teddy Kollek Stadium in Jerusalem as thousands of Israelis cheered. It was the only international event in Israel that was not cancelled due to the uprising, and Canadian Jews showed their solidarity "with boots on the ground."

The Games, he said, "unite us all."

Maccabi Canada vice-president Ned Goodman suggested the organization's funding model – raising money every four years prior to the Games – "has to change" so that money is collected more regularly.

He recalled his involvement with the Games four years ago, when he supported his friend Robert Lantos' efforts to put together a water polo team. He and his family attended the Games and "the feeling was unbelievable at the opening ceremonies."

Turning to the economy, Goodman, a portfolio manager and investment counsellor, said it is impossible to predict the stock market. But, in his more than 40 years in the business, he has learned success depends on optimism, patience and consistency.

Relying on a "gut feeling," Goodman said he believes the market bottomed on March 6. The market turns not when it looks blackest "but just a little less black than the day before. Today, it's a little less black than it was one month ago."

Adding a little free investment advice, Goodman suggested buying gold.

The evening's headliner, Mason, followed Goodman, and if he were an athlete, it could be said he had a lousy first half but came on strong.

The renowned borscht belt comedian focused his wit on U.S. President Barack Obama, but much of his shtick fell flat. Regrouping, he switched to his more familiar and effective observations, though in the stronger second half he seemed to forget where he was and joked about the lack of Jewish athletes.

Some of his observations: on cholesterol (every Jew is an expert on cholesterol. "I guarantee there is not one Jew here who doesn't have Lipitor in his pocket."), marriage (you can't please everyone. "My girlfriend is the most wonderful person to me. That's to me. But to my wife..."), shopping (wife to husband: "You think I enjoy shopping? I went there to save you money."), swimming pools ("Every Jew when they get rich and get a pool, the pool becomes another place to eat around"), the weather ("Is there one person in the world who wants to know the barometric pressure?").

CBC broadcaster Elliotte Friedman served as the evening's host and CHAT student Felicia Hershenhorn sang the Israeli and Canadian anthems.

Israel's World Cup hopes dashed by Greece

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CRETE — An ambitious campaign came to an early but expected demise last week on the island of Crete, as Israel's national soccer team lost to Greece, 2-1.

A blatant foul by Biram Kiyal in front of Israel's goal in the 67th minute allowed Georgios Samaras to score the winner on a penalty kick as goalie Dudu Awat helplessly dove in the wrong direction.

Just eight minutes earlier, Elyaniv Barda had put Israel back in the game with the equalizer.

Now mired in fourth place, Israel has virtually no chance of qualifying for the World Cup. The loss ended Israel's 18-game undefeated streak in World Cup qualifier matches, though Israel managed to score at least one goal for the 15th straight time in such games.

In the wake of drawing Greece and Switzerland last year for its qualifying group, Israel was optimistic about its chances of advancing to the World Cup.

In its excitement, the Israel Football Association, headed by chairman Avi Luzon, pushed aside facts that the current generation of players was inferior, that total reliance on Yossi Benayoun had not borne fruit in previous campaigns, and that Dror Kashtan is well past his prime.

At least this time the drama didn't get dragged out until the final moment as in previous campaigns. It only took a little more than five minutes for the Greeks to take the lead, and it would be ignoring reality to hang everything on Kiyal's unnecessary penalty.

The truth must be said. Switzerland, and especially Greece, may be far from the level of France, Spain or Croatia, but they are better than Israel – even if Israel is ranked 18th, while Greece is 19th and Switzerland is 22nd in the world.

Inside Back

When memory jolts the mind

By MICHAEL GORDON

As a geriatrician with many patients who experienced the Holocaust, I have met individuals who have had profound reactions to events that revive their terrible suppressed memories.

Some survivors can discuss their traumatic experiences, while others find it difficult. Children of Holocaust survivors often recount how little they knew about the experiences of their Holocaust-surviving parents – until late in their parents' lives.

The Senior Side of Life

I have known individuals who have had serious non-Holocaust traumatic experiences that they could not easily recount to their loved ones or to a physician. They may have experienced a trigger that resulted in a psychological reaction associated with the memory of the experience. The precipitant could have been a recent experience, a film, a book or some other media event. The national anthem of a beloved country from which they fled could be a trigger, and sobbing uncontrollably while it is being played is an example of a psychological reaction.

I recently had such an experience after seeing the prize-winning Israeli film Waltz with Bashir, an animated film about an Israeli soldier's recollection of the 1982 Lebanon-Israel war. Although I had a sense of unease about the subject, I reluctantly agreed to see the film with my wife and family members.

I felt a sense of dread as the film progressed, even as I was mesmerized by it. By the end, I was so emotionally distraught that I said to my wife and family members: "I cannot discuss this film now." For the rest of the evening, I didn't participate in family conversation about the film.

It took days before I felt I could express my feelings about the film. A column about the film by Bradley Burston, on the Ha'aretz newspaper website, captured my emotional experience. He wrote: "I went to see Waltz with Bashir this week, not suspecting for a moment that the story it told would have anything to do with me. That, it turns out, is precisely what the film is about. It has to do with everyone who has been in a war here in Israel."

He then described what I had experienced at the film: "What I did not know was that, scene by scene, the film was about to invade me, rumble over me and through me, corner me and take me over. I went to see Waltz with Bashir, but it wasn't really seeing that I did. It wasn't long before the film turned visceral. I saw armoured personnel carriers and knew how to operate and load and clean the machine guns at their turrets, and I began to feel a fist inside rise from my gut upward until it took my windpipe, still from the inside, and strangled the air out of me."

I served as a physician in the Israeli Air Force, and in my last reserve duty in 1973 was involved in the first Israeli initiative to build the Israel-Lebanon border-patrol road. I witnessed war and completed two helicopter evacuations under fire. Like Burston, I could "smell" the spent ammunition as the film progressed. I could feel the whirring and thumping of the helicopters, and I could hear the sound of gunfire from both directions. The scenes of the dead bodies at the end of the film resonated with me.

Waltz with Bashir has helped me to confront distant but deep feelings about my personal experience of war that surface from time to time, as they did during the film. For this, I am grateful, because I now feel a greater understanding of and empathy with the horrifying wartime experiences of my patients. They continue to suffer in their memories, much more than I do or can only imagine.

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindszenthy of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press).

SMOKED SALMON AND DILL MATZOH BREI

6 tblsp sweet butter
2 lg onions, peeled and diced
3 matzoh boards
6 lg eggs
1 1/2 c diced smoked salmon
1/4 c chopped fresh dill
Salt and pepper to taste

Submerge matzoh boards in warm water for 30 secs. Remove from water and set aside. Heat 4 tblsp butter in a large pan over medium-low heat. Add onions, cook slowly until golden brown, approx. 15-20 min. In large bowl, whisk eggs. Break matzoh into egg mixture, add onions, smoked salmon, salt, pepper. Heat 2 tblsp butter in large skillet over medium high heat. Add egg mixture; let cook until eggs are just set, about 2 to 3 min. Fold in dill and serve immediately.

Pesach: the ultimate pedagogic tool

Epi on Education

Pesach is upon us once again, and no Jewish educator can deny that this holiday, more than any other in our calendar, is an educative instrument. The tradition started at the very beginning in Chapter 12 of the book of Exodus. At the very same time that we are told of our imminent liberation from the slavery of Egypt, we are instructed not to think of this great moment as a one-off. No, the historic significance of what is about to happen in the first month (Nisan) marks this date in the full moon of the month as special for all generations to come.

Seymour Epstein

As the paschal lamb is described, one can actually feel the need to ritualize this critical moment in our history. One can only imagine that slaves about to be freed might have other things on their minds, but these particular slaves are asked to participate in the future history of this momentous event. Further, they are told in Chapter 13 to instruct their children about how and why this mighty liberation took place.

Chaim Nachman Bialik, our national poet, would have claimed that this was legend becoming law, the very interaction between history and our people that has sustained us through the centuries and across the world.

The rabbis complemented the pedagogy of Exodus by instituting the seder of Pesach eve, whereby we reenact those first moments of liberation through all five senses: hearing, touch, smell, sight, and taste. And more than that, the Haggadah of Pesach forces us to confront both our slavery and our liberation by God in both thought and feeling. The midrashic text challenges our cognitive powers with its interpretive prowess, and it also moves the heart in its poetic language. Every aspect of the human body and soul is exposed to the notion that each one of us was liberated from Egypt, not just our ancestors.

I know of no educational model more effective.

Seymour Epstein (Epi) is a Jewish educator who lives in Toronto

Fighting anti-Semitism is pursuing freedom

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Happy Pesach. Be free.

Over the last two months, I have called for a community mobilization plan that would include every Jew, and many non-Jews, in a movement to strengthen the Jewish position in the world and fight anti-Semitism.

This entity needs to be both institutional and grassroots in nature, involving major Jewish organizations and smaller less-funded NGOs.

My idea is to create a local – and ultimately a worldwide entity – plan that would oversee a strategy to fight anti-Semitism and would increase positive interaction between Jews, Muslims, Christians and other peoples.

This second part is of utmost importance, as it highlights the core of undercutting Jew hating in our world. Many non-Jews appreciate what Judaism is all about – a peaceful intelligence with a focus on civility, Godliness and activism. Organizations in town involved in educating non-Jews about our people will tell you that given the chance, many gentiles will break bread with us, as they are curious about our ways and our preponderance for learning. This would marginalize the card-carrying anti-Semites.

Is that always the case? No. But for those who subscribe to the rabbinic belief that Esau hates Yaakov – that anti-Semitism will always exist and cannot be modified or adjusted, I think the reality is otherwise. Read Rescue in Denmark, by Harold Flender, a book about the population of Denmark's spontaneous organization into a resistance group that rescued almost all of that country's Jewish community during World War II. Non-Jews will fight for us, especially if we encourage their friendship.

I received a number of e-mails from people who read my articles here and on Haaretz.com. The messages varied from: "Doesn't this already exist" (there is no overall plan to involve every Jew) to "how do I get involved?" Israeli Ami Isseroff said that aliyah is the answer, but "we cannot walk the little, old lady across the street if she does not want to go."

Some rabbis have met with their members about such a plan. This is positive.

I have heard from organizations involved in fighting anti-Semitism, some of whom insisted I was undermining their activities. One Jewish community worker told me I was denigrating his organization. Nonsense.

You are doing good work, but defending the Jewish people cannot be in the hands of a few Jewish community professionals, the government of Israel and Israel Defence Forces. It must be spread around, as numbers are required to make massive "on the ground" changes, so you and I can breathe a breath of control into our future. We are a small, malleable people who can organize effectively.

I have created an e-mail list of people who want to attend an initial meeting. Let me know if you would like an invitation.

We have survived for thousands of years because of our unbridled independence, our refusal to lie down, our decentralized communities and because of a promise from God.

Along the road, however, we have lost many of our members because of anti-Semitism. It is our obligation to do what we can, in their memory and, for the sake of our Jewishness, to slow down the oldest hatred and maybe even stop it.

Pesach is a holiday when we remember our slavery and celebrate our freedom. Anti-Semitism attempts to enslave us. Fighting it, with everything we got, is pursuing freedom. Let's be free. We are all hungry for this, so we must all come and eat. Chag Samayach. Happy Pesach.

The possibility of prose and poetry

Editorial

It is with great pleasure that we once again publish our annual Passover literary supplement. The CJN is delighted to provide this possibility to our readers. Fewer and fewer are the opportunities these days – in a world that increasingly views print and paper as an ancien régime – for non-professional writers to find a page or a space of ink and vellum for their own poetry and prose.

As is the case each year, we receive far more submissions that we can accommodate. Choosing what to publish is necessarily subjective and unavoidably disappointing to the individuals whose works are not chosen. We apologize for any undue disappointment our choices may cause. We do, however, assure everyone who submitted material that the choices were not easy to make.

To the varied and eclectic literary selections from our readers, we have added two items of special content to the supplement.

In commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of the late illustrious Canadian poet, essayist and writer A.M. Klein, we have included an essay by the renowned Canadian Yiddishist Simcha Simchovitch on the subject of Klein's celebrated novel, The Second Scroll.

The supplement also includes a selection of archival photos of Operation Solomon.

Jews from Ethiopia boarding the plane that would take them to Israel.

In a secret, clandestine operation fraught with danger, the government of Israel over the course of a fateful 36 hours, rescued some 14,000 Ethiopian Jews and brought them to their Promised Land, the State of Israel.

In the next few weeks, as the actual May anniversary date of the rescue approaches, we hope to provide more coverage of Operation Solomon. It was one of the most significant acts of bravery, selflessness and humanitarian greatness in the latter half of the last century.

We decided, however, to begin our commemoration of the anniversary early in partial response to the obscene "apartheid" slander that Israel's enemies triumphantly hurl at the Jewish state.

One need spend only a few moments on any street, in any coffee house, in any school, playground or workplace, on any beach or in any army base in Israel to see the day-to-day, living refutation of the "apartheid" calumny.

Operation Solomon was only one among countless official and unofficial acts of kindness and rescue by the people and the government of Israel reaching out to receive, shelter and otherwise assist many of the world's oppressed.

We hope our readers will find enjoyment and perhaps even inspiration in the pages of the supplement.

To all who submitted works of prose and poetry, we thank you.

To all who will now read what we have published, we also say thank you and enjoy.

Ḥag Pesaḥ Samayaḥ.

Wishing good health and happiness to all our friends and clients during this season of celebration and reflection.

'FOR EVERYTHING THERE'S A REASON'

By ROSE ROMBERG

This past week of violent weather
I remain in my apartment for comfort.

A collection of books of 40 years plus,
Crowding my shelves, constant dust collectors.
Empty cartons have been lying in wait to be filled

For everything there's a reason.
A time for reading, a time for storing
A time for dispensing, a time for goodbye.
A time for praying

I remove book by book.
Reluctant to part with, for they have given substance to my life.
Two days work, not a labour of love.
Shakespeare's Romeo was not thinking of books when he romanced Juliet:
"Parting is such sweet sorrow."

I scan a page or two like a last goodbye to an old friend.
Longfellow, A.A. Milne, Stephen Birmingham,
Jean Euel, Elie Wiesel, Grisham,
Chaim Potok, Sholom Aleichem and the list goes on…

As habit permits, I read a passage from the Tanach, eyes grow tired.
I fall asleep from physical and emotional
Exhaustion…I dream a nightmare.

I'm sitting on a colossal rock.
A huge serpent-bird circles high above.
His crest of flaming quills in frantic motion.
His long feet with only three claws
Clutching a package in helicon grip.
He is descending in missile speed, dropped a huge book into my lap with explosive force.

I awaken with silent scream!
Drenched in perspiration.
My hand groping in the dark.
I turn on the bed light, eyes searching, searching.
I see the Tanach on the floor.

A 'Bissel' Yiddish

By SAMHARA A. ZATZMAN

I want to learn a "bissel" Yiddish.
Just a bissel –
Enough to say: I made an effort to look into my past…
But not too much… because, who speaks Yiddish anymore anyway? Right?
So, Just a bissel –
To say to my ancestors, pictures staring at me from the wall: "I tried"!
I didn't completely forget about you!
A bissel Yiddish for all you've suffered;
the countries you escaped from; learning English from a newspaper; your efforts to be Jewish and proud of it!
Just a bissel Yiddish please, so I can understand my Bubbie and Sabba when they converse in private!
Maybe a bissel Yiddish to make up for all the questions I want to ask and never do?
A bissel Yiddish to wish I spent more time with my grandparents, yet never do.
A bissel Yiddish to meld past and present generations?
A bissel Yiddish to placate my heart;
to pretend it is enough.
A bissel Yiddish is not enough:
I can't converse; can only understand one line of a song my Sabba used to sing.
A bissel Yiddish is not enough –
But it's a start.

Happy Passover!

A Surprise

By APRIL LAUFER

Sammy eyed his mom a little warily. He watched as she closed the cupboards and put tape on them so nobody would open them accidentally.

It was almost Pesach. Mom had been cleaning for weeks. All of the foods that Sammy liked to eat were inside those cupboards.

"Mommy," he asked, watching her take out the last of the bread and bagels from the freezer.

"Mmmm," she answered as she started to wipe out the now-empty freezer.

"I'm hungry."

"So eat something."

"No," said Sammy, "I mean I'm hungry on Pesach. On Pesach, I'm always hungry. I miss my cereal and my peanut butter and jam sandwiches, and all that other good stuff."

"When Pesach is over, I'll get you lots of cereal."

"When?" he asked.

"In a week," she answered as she continued wiping the sides of the freezer.

"But what will I do for a whole week?" Sammy asked plaintively.

"You'll just have to eat matzah."

"I don't like that burnt stuff that Uncle Mordechai brings."

"That's just for the seder night. You like the regular matzah."

A whole week, thought Sammy. He frowned. Oh-oh, here comes my sad face, he thought.

A tear streaked down Sammy's face as he played with the bread that was starting to defrost on the table.

"Sammy, what's wrong?"

"I don't like Pesach," he complained.

"You know," said his mom, bending down in front of him and wiping away his tear, "that's not quite true."

"Yes, it is."

"Well," said his mom, "I remember you had a really nice time with all your cousins last year." She played with his hair, running her fingers through it. "And I remember that you were pretty happy about finding the afikoman."

Sammy looked up.

"And you really do like chicken soup and matzah balls and Bubbie's gefilte fish and..."

But Sammy wasn't listening any more; he was thinking about last year. Every year Zaide promised that the person who found the afikoman would get a big surprise. Last year, it had been Sammy's turn.

While everyone had been busy eating he had kept his eye on his zaide. Every time Zaide adjusted the pillow on his chair, Sammy stretched his neck to see if his zaide was trying to hide the afikoman. He almost forgot to eat his chicken soup because he was so busy watching his zaide. But it had been worth it.

He had seen his zaide look over at his abba. He could tell something was up when he saw his abba nod his head and raise his eyebrows in Zaide's direction. Zaide had smiled back. Then he noticed his zaide lean toward his uncle and whisper something in his ear as he passed something to him. Sammy ducked his head under the table and, yes, they were passing the afikoman from one lap to the next. He watched until it reached his father, who kept it. Then he saw his abba stretch and reach back. Bingo. That was it. Abba had hidden the afikoman behind his pillow. Easy as pie.

> 'You were pretty happy about finding the afikoman'

A minute later, Sammy had very casually walked over to his abba and given him a hug and stolen the afikoman! He was so excited. His cousins started protesting that it wasn't fair, because it wasn't time to find the afikoman yet. But Sammy didn't care.

"I found it," he told everyone. "I stole it from Abba." The adults clapped, and his cousins groaned. Some of the younger cousins wanted him to hide it so they could try to find it, but he held on to it for dear life until his zaide said it was time for dessert.

And as soon as the holiday was over, Zaide had taken him to buy his very first bike. It was a two-wheeler. They couldn't quite decide if he needed training wheels, too, but in the end Zaide said that maybe, just in case, they should put them on. The bike was perfect. It had shiny silver spokes, and it was blue with a yellow stripe that looked like a bolt of lightning. And Zaide had attached the training wheels. Just in case.

'Did you practise the ma nishtana?'

Before he got to ride his bike, his zaide said that he would try it out just to be sure that everything was in working order. The bike was way too small for his zaide, but he lifted his leg over the seat of the bike and walked down the driveway with the bike between his knees.

When his zaide pronounced that the bike seemed to be in working order, Sammy couldn't contain his excitement. "Zaide, I love you," Sammy said as he let his grandfather adjust his helmet.

"Love you, too," Zaide said as he patted the helmet. "Snug?" he asked.

"Perfect," Sammy said. And off he went down the driveway all by himself.

"Careful," Zaide called. "You're a new driver." Sammy laughed.

It would be so fantastic if Sammy could find the afikoman this year, too! He would have to watch really carefully, because for sure his cousins were going to try to find the afikoman before he could. That made him a little nervous. He wondered where his zaide might hide it. If he could just think of some really good hiding places, he could tell his zaide. Zaide always said he appreciated how smart Sammy was.

"You know what?" said his mom interrupting his reverie. "Why don't you put out the bread for Abba to find? I'll get you some napkins to wrap up the pieces, so we don't make any extra crumbs."

She gave him a hug.

"I wonder where I put last year's candle and feather. I better go look for it while I remember."

Then frowning, she pointed her finger at Sammy, "Don't hide the pieces like you did last year." Last year, Sammy had done a really good job hiding the bread around the kitchen and refused to say where he had put the pieces until his mom and dad begged him.

If only he could think of a really good place to hide the afikoman.

When Sammy's mom came back into the kitchen with the candle and feather, Sammy was smiling.

"What's up?" she asked. "You look happy."

"Oh, I was just thinking... I could help Zaide find a really good hiding spot for the afikoman. Then he wouldn't have to worry about leading the seder and where to hide it."

"Oh," said his mom. "Well, maybe we could both come up with some really good hiding places. We don't want the cousins to be mad because Zaide took your ideas. And," she continued, "since you found it last year, maybe one of the cousins needs a chance this year."

This was a little worrying for Sammy.

"Well," said Sammy, "I could steal it first and then I could hide it, too. Then the cousins could try to find out where I hid it. Do you think that's a good idea?"

"I do," said his mom.

"I just have to steal it first. Where do you think Zaide will hide it this year?" Sammy asked.

"I don't have any idea."

"Me, too," said Sammy.

"Why don't we put out the bread now," said his mom. "Abba will be home soon."

"Okay," said Sammy, jumping up from his chair.

Sammy was smiling to himself as he started to take the bread and wrap each of the pieces; he was thinking about hiding places for the afikoman. His zaide could hide it and then he could hide it. Then everyone would get a chance to find the afikoman, even if he found it first. He wondered for a moment if finding it first meant that he would get the surprise or if he would have to share the surprise with one of his cousins. That was OK he decided. They could share. Maybe he could discuss some ideas with Zaide about where they might hide the afikoman.

The phone rang. Sammy was concentrating on wrapping up the last pieces of bread as he heard his mom say hello.

"Zaide wants to speak to you," she told him. Perfect, thought Sammy as he ran to take the phone.

"Hi, Zaide," he said.

"Hi, Sammy, hope you're ready for tomorrow night." Sammy could tell his zaide was smiling. Funny, how you hear a smile, thought Sammy.

"Did you practise the ma nishtana?"

"We did it at school aaaallll week."

"That's good"

"Zaide, you know what?"

"What, Motek?"

"Zaide, I have an idea."

"Ideas are good," said his zaide, sounding interested.

"Well, you know, this year I was thinking about where to hide the afikoman." Sammy heard his zaide give a little chuckle but before Sammy could finish there was a crash in the background.

Passover means many things to many people.

For Liat, it is a time to breathe a sigh of relief knowing that her daughter, Tamar will get some extra food at her Na'amat daycare and some food sent home for the family.

Despite the hardship that this single mother is facing, Liat tells her daughter how lucky they are; lucky to have friends at Na'amat —friends that care.

Give today, so that Liat and Tamar can have a better tomorrow.

'Finish putting out the bread'

"Oh my," said his zaide. "I'll have to call you back. It looks like Bubbie needs my help." And Zaide hung up just like that, before Sammy got to tell him his good idea.

Sammy put the phone back.

"What's up?" said his mom who was scouring the sink.

"Nothing. Zaide had to go help Bubbie."

When the phone rang a minute later, he picked it up, hoping it was Zaide calling back.

"Hi, sweetie, how are you?"

"Fine, Bubbie," Sammy exhaled. "Is Zaide there?"

"No, sweetheart. I had to send him out to buy some more horseradish, because I dropped the jar."

"Oh," said Sammy.

"Can I speak to Mom for a minute? I want to ask her something."

"Mommy, Bubbie wants to talk to you."

Sammy was a little worried.

"Finish putting out the bread," his mom said with a gesture of her arm that indicated the area of the kitchen.

His mom started talking on the phone and Sammy went to the table.

"What should I do with this," Sammy said, indicating the bagel that was also on the table.

His mom was still talking on the phone, but she put her hand over the receiver to say, "You can wrap that up, too. Don't forget you have to hide all 10 pieces." Before she started talking to Bubbie again she reminded Sammy, "I don't mean hide – I mean just put them out. OK?"

His mom was listening to his bubbie on the phone, and Sammy was trying really hard to think of hiding places for the afikoman.

He heard his mom say, "Oh, it's in the other room. Hold on a minute, I'll go get it for you."

Then turning to Sammy, she said, "Bubbie needs me to check something. I'll be right back."

'He knew exactly how to make this year's seder even better'

She put the phone on the counter. She eyed the pieces of bread that still needed to be wrapped and with a wink at Sammy she said, "You finish up and I won't see where you put the rest of the bread."

When his mom left the room, Sammy looked at the bread in his hand. He had already put out seven pieces and had three to go. Where should they go?

"Hang up the phone," his mom yelled. "I'll be down in a minute."

Sammy picked up the phone from the counter and could hear his bubbie and mom talking about the desserts for the seder meal. Very quietly he put the phone back in the cradle. He wished he had had a chance to discuss with his zaide about some good hiding places.

Sammy continued putting out the bread for his abba to find. Looking at the bagel that he hadn't wrapped yet, he suddenly had a really funny idea. He knew exactly how to make this year's seder even better than last year's. He took the bagel and squished it into his pocket. Tomorrow night after he stole the afikoman he would hide it – inside the bagel. When the cousins couldn't find it, he would tell everyone that he had a big surprise.

God Is Yelling at the Children of Israel

By DAN YASHINSKY

Tuesday afternoon in a Toronto gym
And God is yelling – again –
At the children of Israel –
God – a grade one teacher
Here at the Jewish Community Centre –
Has reached His limit –
"Isaiah! You can sit out UNTIL you learn to share the ball!" –
Isaiah stomps over to the corner
And the game goes on
By rules I can't discern
From the running track above –
Squeals of six-year-old glee
Ricocheting off the high roof
As the people of the book
Become the people of the game –
Young Sarahs, Jacobs, Leahs, and Isaacs
Chase the ball in a rush
Of confused competition, high spirits, uncertain rules –
Isaiah returns to the fray
Temporarily contrite
Promising God not to boss around his playmates –
"I LOVE this game!" shouts one,
"I HATE this game!" cries another refusing to play –
Such imperfect followers-of-rules,
Such exuberant improvisers!
So exasperating! So beautiful!
You can tell why Isaiah became so bossy
And God, now withdrawn to the side of the gym,
Looks discouraged, puzzled, or just exhausted
With His rambunctious kids
As if he'd rather be reading a Russian novel
Or doing Sudoku –
Luckily another adult voice is heard –
A woman with an Israeli accent,
Another teacher perhaps,
Who marshals the scattered group
Lays down the rules
(apparently there are some)
Shouts them through the game
Then marches the giggling, arguing, protesting Mini-tribe back
To the young man on the sidelines who,
Godlike, has again grounded
The diminutive Isaiah
For the second or tenth time that day –
He "leads" them
(no real line-ups for this unruly and opinionated crowd of grade ones)
To the gym door and back to class –
I'm on the track above
Jogging like an aging angel with sore knees
Who, lacking Isaiah's fire,
God's resignation,
And the Israeli's command
Chooses to float in circles above the clamour
Revelling in the early, bright and irresistible voices
Of my people.

I Am Jerusalem!

By BRANDON MARLON

I am the tireless subject
Fluttering ten thousand tongues
I am the picture painted
By master artists in each generation
I am the muscular mounts
The voluptuous valleys
The cobblestone remnants
Beneath pilgrims' precious feet
The underground tunnels
Propping up millennial layers
I am beloved by prophets
By high priests and saints
I am the markets and accents
Colouring public squares
I am the city of David
May his name ever reign
I am the cave and the crypt
The name inked in script
I am the blood spilt in crevices
The sweat on the brows of my defenders
I am the symbol and the thought
Not extinguished with the Temple's fire
I am the blaze in the hearts
Of my loyal rememberers
I am rolling hills and high walls
That loftily arise
In the sparkling pupils of admiring eyes
I am the golden crown and its diamond gem
Eternally, I am Jerusalem!

Never Again

By COURTNEY FIRESTONE
Grade 10 student

The year is 1948.
Israel is founded – celebrate!
The Shoah has seen too many Jews slain,
The entire world swears, "Never again."

The year is 1949.
Life in Yemen is increasingly not fine.
"On eagles' wings they'll arrive," Israel does proclaim, Always remembering, "Never again."

The year is 1989.
Many exit visas Russia finally does sign.
Israel welcomes the Soviet Jews to its domain,
Repeating the mantra, "Never again."

The year is 1991.
Rebellion and instability in Ethiopia have begun.
Operation Solomon achieves Israel's aim,
Fulfilling the promise, "Never again."

The year is 2005.
The Intifadah sees French anti-Semitism thrive.
Israel is a refuge from many Jews' bane,
Our country announces, "Never again."

The year is 2009.
Missile after missile hits Israel by design.
Yet in Sderot and the Negev, Jews still must remain,
What ever happened to, "Never again"?

Wishing you a Happy & Healthy Passover.

Mother

By CARLA J. SILVER

I sat in the room with mother for a long time. It was quiet and she was quiet. In the hall I could hear other noises, but they seemed distant, far away from both of us. It seemed to last forever, and there, in the quiet, I thought about things I hadn't recalled in years.

I remembered how, when I was young, mother would tell me history for bedtime stories. When other children were learning about Jack and Jill, I was learning that Jack was King James II of England, Jill was his wife, Mary of Modena, and fetching a pail of water was really a metaphor for being baptized in the Catholic faith. We never played Ring around the Rosy. We dramatized the great plague and created posies, with wild flowers, or sometimes even with garlic cloves, to wear around our necks.

I recalled her introducing me to the piano, on the beautiful, burnished walnut, French provincial, grand piano her mother had given her. In the summer of 1929, before the great crash, when mother was three years old, her mother saw that piano at Eaton's. Mr. Forbes, the piano salesman, became friendly with my grandmother, because she stopped to visit that piano so often, but the cost was prohibitive, $2,500. "I have a very gifted daughter," she told Mr. Forbes. "She's only three years old, but already she shows a gift for music."

In November of 1929, after the great crash, the phone rang at my grandmother's house. "You know that piano?" Mr. Forbes asked. "Now, if you want it, it's being sold for $500." My grandmother took that piano. And mother introduced me to playing on it. We would sit for hours playing childlike duets, like rainstorms. I would sit on the big, needle-pointed bench, tinkling away at the highest notes, being the rain. And mother would sit at the bottom, playing ominous-sounding diminished seventh chords, being the thunder. I would make her switch sides time and time again. For music, I could sit still, even as a toddler.

In the car, we would sing, almost all the time. I would bounce in the back singing songs by the Weavers or labour union songs from the 1930s. "We shall not be, we shall not be moved… Just like the trees that stand beside the river side, we shall not be moved."

Most of the time, however, I could be a most annoying child. I couldn't focus long enough to complete even the simplest task. Mother would send me upstairs to get a meat dishtowel. Fleishig and milchig were separate in our house, and fleishig was always red and milchig was always blue. I would get to the top of the stairs, open the linen closet door and stare inside. "I can't find any," I would yell petulantly downstairs.

"They're right in front of you," mother would call back, patiently at first.

"There aren't any," I'd answer. Then I'd hear my mother's footsteps trudging resentfully up the stair, interrupting whatever task she had been at in the kitchen. "Shick nach hamelech hamoivis," she would mutter at me in Yiddish, under her breath. "We'll send you to find the angel of death." Of course, the meat towel was always right in front of my eyes, and she would yank it off the shelf, turn around and trudge back down the stairs, still muttering.

Epithets, secrets and complaints in Yiddish were the norm in our house. In Yiddish, I learned that "Sie dreyt sich vie a fortz im rossel," my head spun like passing gas in a thick pea soup. All very scatalogical. I had my father's sense of humour.

Mother was fanatical about two things, music and reading. She could read everything. She had an insatiable curiosity and read mysteries and history with equal fervour. People would say she was the most wonderful conversationalist they had ever met, but she once told me the secret. In fact, those people were usually the ones who had done all the talking. Mother said that if you read enough to have a wide general knowledge, whenever you met someone, you just had to know enough to ask one good question. Anyone who loves what they do will happily talk about it for hours. Reading was her greatest gift to me. I learned to disappear in my room for hours at a stretch, devouring whole pocket books in one sitting.

The noises in the hall were growing louder, and after a few hours, someone came to get my mother. I looked at her, one last time, lying there on the bed.

"Mother," I thought, "you should have sent me to find the angel of death."

Passover Greetings

Fallen Angel

By DAVID MIADOVNIK

With her back pressing against a boulder and her feet dipped in the water, Ahava, a beautiful shepherdess, sits at the edge of a pond watching her flock. Heavy eyelids and a depressed frown mark her face.

She wiggles her foot in the water with boredom and sighs. Ahava continually adjusts her focus as she monitors the sheep. Cautiously, she glances behind the boulder at the makeshift tent to confirm her hopes that her husband is still slumbering within.

Ahava shifts her attention to the heavens and gazes at the moon. She takes a deep, meditative breath and begins to speak.

"My Father, my King, in the beginning You created the heaven and the earth. You said, 'Let there be light,' and there was, and You saw it was good. The light was divided from the darkness. You called the light day and the darkness night. There was evening and morning, one day."

Ahava pauses momentarily. She wipes a single tear and sniffles before resuming her address.

"There was another thing You created, my lord, me. But I was born in the clouds, not on the earth. You entrusted me with the duty of spreading the word of peace to the peoples, and you blessed me with wings so the message might travel that much faster."

She grits her teeth and tightly closes her eyes for an instant, attempting to control her almost overwhelming emotions. Tears slide down Ahava's cheeks as she scrapes the ground with tensed hands to alleviate stress. She unties her robes, removes the torso portion of her garments and reveals her bare upper body.

On Ahava's back are two large and grotesque scabs. The scabs are a hardened cocktail of blood, pus and a few feathers.

"Why? Why did You take my wings Lord? Was I unworthy of Your tasks? Was I unworthy of being an angel, or was I just unworthy of being close to You?"

Ahava curls herself up, covers her face with her hands and weeps for what she feels is an eternity.

"My Father, my King, You assigned each angel a mission. Yet You neglected to provide me with such. You told me to travel to this desert's outskirts and await instructions, as I did. But I found no mission awaiting me. All I found was a shepherd who was beaten and stoned by radicals for his views of you."

Ahava rests her head on her knees; she suppresses painful emotion with a mask of impassiveness. However, all efforts to conceal feelings are in vain as tears drip down her face.

"You would have been proud of me. I nursed the shepherd back to health. I tended to his wounds, I fed him, I provided him with water and I cared for his flock. Yet, I made a critical error in my conduct. I fell in love. I am aware that protocol opposes angels associating with mortals in such a manner, but over the months as I treated his injuries and got to truly know him, we developed feeling toward each other."

Though her disposition is melancholy, Ahava's own talking calms her. She stretches her legs, leans against the boulder and wraps her arms across her chest.

"Once his health returned, he proposed to me. I remember he came into the tent as I prepared supper. He held my hand and said, 'In all my life, I have never met anyone like you. I have never seen such warm-heartedness. You cared for me when I was close to death. That is why I can't stand the thought of you leaving.' He got down on one knee, presented a ring and asked me to marry him. At first I hesitated, but then I experienced a rush of happiness and saying no became impossible."

Ahava descends into silence. Her breathing quickens and becomes heavy, and her body twitches with agitation. She stands, and glares sorrowfully at the heavens.

"One day, I returned from the marketplace and found my home in shambles. I saw the radicals holding a knife to my husband's throat; they had heard rumours of a shepherd who married an angel. I begged them to spare him, but one said, 'God's messengers don't bestow affection on disgusting dogs.'

"I told them that I would give anything to save my husband.

"They said, 'If you love this worthless shepherd, then you don't love God. So relinquish the wings that link you to the Almighty!' They handed me a sabre, and without thinking, I cut my wings off. The radicals freed my husband and left, taking my wings as a memento. My question to you, Lord, is why did this happen? Why did I have to choose between my wings and my love?"

A sandstorm suddenly envelops Ahava. The air collects Ahava's removed garments and dresses her again.

"Ahava my child," whispers the wind.

"My Lord, you answered," replies Ahava with shock.

"I have never left your side."

"Lord, I apologize for my outbursts."

"Your apology is unnecessary. You have proven yourself worthy of a new undertaking."

"Forgive me, but I fail to understand."

"When I moulded you, I blessed you with a loving spirit. That's why I named you Ahava. All that you experienced and endured was a test of that spirit."

"What does that mean?"

"Angels spread My message across the Earth from the clouds. However, humankind cannot hear lessons of peace if their teachers dwell in the Heavens. When I saw you sever your wings to protect your husband, I felt your love, and chose you to be the messenger of loving. Your work will be challenging and span great lengths of time, but with an angel who walks upon the Earth, humanity will finally learn."

The sandstorm dissipates. Ahava stands alone by the water with an expression of pride. She walks to the tent, opens the flaps and before entering, she looks out at the stars.

"I won't fail you."

Would You Still See Me

By DEBORA RESNICK

I see your hijab when you walk into our office, but I also see your round, brown face and smiling eyes.
You ask our secretary a question, she answers.
You ask another question and I answer.
We chat a little, I make a small joke, you smile and you leave.
Another student with a hijab walks into our office.
She has a serious expression, but when I answer her questions she relaxes and smiles too.
After you are both gone I go into my office and wonder,
are you infected,
if you knew that my people wore hats and wigs would you still smile,
would you still see me?

THE WALLS OF THE GHETTO

By PEARL ADLER SABAN

The walls of the ghetto encircled you.
The walls of the ghetto enclosed you.
The walls of the ghetto framed you.
Framed your life and the lives of your loved ones.
You, with your tattered yellow star marking you
Jew. Schweinhund. Part of a damned nation.
It is fear that fed you when the cupboards were bare.
It is bravery that sustained you when that fear was spent.

You fought to the bitter end –
The rat-tat-tat of machine gun artillery echoing off the barren walls of that wasteland.
The raining of bombs all around you.
The smell of death hovering… Always hovering.

With hands up in the air, with this gesture of surrender, of final supplication
You the boy, already a man, left your legacy.

And we remember. We always remember…

MY FRIDAY NIGHT PRAYER

By MARY COLA (LEFELL-FROST — 1908-2002)

I don a cap of pure white lace,
Three Shabbos candles I then face.
I light these candles Friday night,
Before sunset, while still light.

I then homage to the Lord above,
With greatest fervour and full of love.
To thank Him for each day of grace,
For giving this world such a beautiful face.

I pray for my children, their families and friends,
Neighbours and enemies, I will pray to my end.
To thank Him for watching and protecting us all,
So that we may always stand firm and tall.

My thanks at last are for my husband and myself,
Praying He will grant us good blessings and good health.

In tribute to a 'psalmist among poets'

In honour of 100 years of the birth of A.M. Klein

By SIMCHA SIMCHOVITCH

The Second Scroll, by A.M. Klein is a book of unique structure, style and content. To pattern a work of fiction after the Pentateuch and to add to it "Glosses" such as the exegetical commentaries to the Written Law is indeed a very risky undertaking for a modern writer.

Only a master in the craft, as Klein was, only a man so deeply grounded in Judaic learning as well as in the poetic lore of the English language, could have produced such a rich, subtle and many-levelled book.

The Second Scroll was A.M. Klein's only book of prose. It was written at the height of his career as a poet and it summarized, in a way, his poetical essence, his lifelong vision of a rebuilt Zion and of a humanity at last humane, as Desmond Pacey says in Ten Canadian Poets.

According to American critic and novelist Ludwig Lewisohn, Klein was "the most Jewish poet who has ever used the English tongue."

Pacey sees Klein as "psalmist among poets" and his poetry as a lyrical expression of jubilation, despair and hope. This intense inner struggle, from which the poet emerges renewed in strength and in faith, is especially recognizable in "The psalter of Abraham Haktani," which forms the main part of his collection titled Poems (Philadelphia, JPS, 1944).

In Psalm XXXVI, the last of the series, Klein summarizes his intense and complete identification with the fate, history and tradition of his people, in both the spiritual and physical realms of his existence: "Not sole was I born, but entire genesis:/ For to the fathers that begat me, this/ Body is residence..."

Along with Klein's identification with the Jewish People, we find in his poetry a strong social consciousness and sensitivity to the life of the workers, the poor – the common people. This is seen mainly in his poems of the '30s, but also in a more refined form in The Rocking Chair (Toronto: The Ryerson Press, 1948). This moral passion for social justices and his deep attachment to the Jewish People, are nurtured from the same source – the pathos of the prophets of Israel and the teachings of the sages of the Talmud.

All these motifs and themes are found in The Second Scroll.

Here Klein attempted to summarize the Jewish experience between the two world wars – a fateful and apocalyptic era for the Jews of Europe especially, and the Jewish People at large. The main figure in the book, in addition to the author-narrator, is the mysterious Uncle Melech, the revered prodigy of Ratno, Ukraine, who, after a pogrom, turns into a Bolshevik, a zealot of the Society of Godlessness, and later into a Marxist authority in European literature.

The transformation of Melech Davidson

The sudden transformation of Melech Davidson from yeshiva scholar into radical intellectual is quite common and understandable. It has been a road taken, under pressure of external and internal circumstances, by many young, educated Jews since the beginning of the Haskalah movement (the Enlightenment) in the latter part of the 18th century.

However, the second transformation of Melech from the secular revolutionary to the religious mystic and Messiah-figure is more unusual and complex. Already in 1939, when the Soviets have concluded their pact with Germany, Melech, shocked and deeply disappointed by events, begins to realize that his attachment to communism was "a saying of grace before poison," as literary critic M.W. Steinberg described it.

Then the Nazi occupation begins.

The Jewish community of Kamenets, where Melech finds himself, is slaughtered. He is the sole survivor, bewildered and burdened by the guilt of remaining alive. These traumatic experiences bring Melech back to his people.

After the war, he follows the stream of Jewish survivors out of Poland and the Soviet Union into the refugee camps of western Europe.

While the writer is preparing to visit the newly established State of Israel, he receives the first letter from his uncle in the refugee camp of Bari, Italy. He decides to visit his strange relative on the way to Israel. When he arrives at Bari, however, he learns that his uncle has gone to Rome, where he has befriended a priest, Monsignor Piersant, who works in the Vatican Library.

After meeting Monsignor Piersant, the writer learns about his uncle's inner struggles regarding his faith and the validity of Judaism after the Holocaust. The reader learns however, that as a result of his conflicts, Melech emerged more strengthened in his faith and in his attachment to Judaism. Before settling finally in Israel, he lives among the poverty-stricken Sephardi Jews in the mellah – the Jewish ghetto of Casablanca.

The search of the modern Jew for lost identity

The narrator comes close to meeting his mysterious uncle when he visits the old synagogue of Rabbi Isaac Lurie, the famous 16th-century Kabbalist, in Safed. It is here, we learn, that among the pietistic mystics, Uncle Melech completed his spiritual odyssey and found himself anew. But alas, on one of his routine visits to a religious community on Israel's border, he is murdered by an Arab terrorist.

Thus, the nephew from abroad is privileged to "meet" his uncle only at his uncle's funeral.

The search for and ultimate "meeting" with Uncle Melech form the backbone of the meagre plot in The Second Scroll. It allows the author to chronicle the soul-searching and transformation of Melech as well as his Canadian kin.

In the eyes of A.M. Klein, Uncle Melech rises to become a symbolic figure – a representative of the Jewish People, its fate, its destiny and its creative spirit.

Not by chance is the writer's name Melech Davidson (King, son of David). He becomes the Messiah-figure, sufferer and redeemer, who proclaims his Jewish rebirth and authenticates it with his life and his death. His descent into the "Valley of Tears" of the Casablanca mellah is in accordance with Jewish legends of a suffering messiah living among the stricken and the poor. At the same time, Melech retains his former radical zeal for social justice: he is shaken by the inhuman conditions he finds there and attempts to organize the people and to arouse public conscience in their favour.

Melech's searching and spiritual adventures are characteristic of the search of the modern, emancipated Jew for his lost identity. He frees himself finally from the shackles of the assimilationist, materialistic approach of Marxism and from his very brief flirtation with Catholicism.

He finds his place among the mystics and pietists of Safed. But here, too, he is an activist and lends a helping hand to the builders and defenders of Israel.

Uncle Melech also symbolizes the new unity of his people. He lives among his Sephardi brethren in Casablanca, who in turn join thousands and tens of thousands of their east European brethren, the survivors of the death camps, in building the State of Israel. Melech's funeral is thus envisioned by Klein "as if the tribes of Israel had come to life again and were travelling as in the olden times, each with its devices and gems."

The life and death of Melech Davidson, in Klein's view, are proof of the miraculousness of the Jewish existence. Melech's survival in Europe and return to the Land of Israel, as well as his tragic death, point to this miracle of rebirth, of life emerging from death and destruction.

Only thus can the writer grasp the natural miracle in the everyday existence of the Jewish People in their land. He finds inspiration not so much in the secular modern Hebrew poetry, but in the efforts of the ordinary people to express themselves and organize their lives in the newly acquired, still flowering Hebrew tongue.

As a result of his search and eventual discovery of his uncle, the narrator's views on Jewish history are also altered. The Arch of Titus that stands in Rome, itself a reminder of the destruction of the Second Temple, thus becomes "an irony directed against itself; the candelabrum, set against the new light that had been kindled across the Great Sea, had turned into satire; the trumpets, symbolic now of jubilee, really taunted Titus!"

Passover Greetings

Klein observes and chronicles the travails of new immigrants to Israel starting a new life in a new land.

[IGPO photo]

Seeing religion in founding of state

Klein is repulsed by the shallow attitude of some Israeli intellectuals who negate the Diaspora Jew, "a conviction that Jewry abroad was doomed... if not immediately, eventually..." Klein sees this approach by the new Israelis as a sign of their disbelief in the spiritual potential of the people and as a neurotic, secular urge to cut themselves off from the distinctly Jewish past and present outside Israel and begin everything anew in their fledgling society.

The author does not accept the view either of the Diaspora Zionist or of the assimilationist that with the emergence of the State of Israel, the Jewish People has returned to active, living history and time. He cannot express his reasons during a discussion in an airplane with a Zionist. But when he meets a young boy studying his talmudic portion beside an old Kabbalist in a Safed synagogue, it is then that he realizes "Israel had not only returned back into Time; it still belonged to eternity."

One can argue with Klein, as author Miriam Waddington does, from a secularist's point of view. One can question Klein's passive acceptance of Jewish fate or his attempt to see in an event of such demonic proportions as the Holocaust, the "suffering pangs" of the birth of the State of Israel. But all these arguments are futile because Klein accepts from the beginning a deeply religious approach to the founding of the state, and this is the premise on which he builds his entire literary structure. As John Milton and Rabbi Levi Yitzhak of Berditchev both understood, one can argue and plead with God, but in the end, one has no choice but to accept Him and acknowledge His higher infinite wisdom.

In the discussion with the Zionist in the airplane, Klein asks: "And what role... does Providence play in your scheme? You have forgotten, in your thesis, to place God."

A work of rich, particularist and universal content

The answer to this question is given at the end of the book, when Uncle Melech's nephew recites the Mourner's Kaddish, which makes no mention of death but exalts the name of the Almighty.

The Glosses which comprise the second half of the book, in my opinion, strengthen the content and the ideas of the book. Gloss Aleph is autobiographical. In it, the poet reveals the source of his Jewish consciousness: the joyful experiences of his childhood and youth in the Yiddish-speaking section of Montreal. This joy of living Jewishly and of Judaism's traditions and lore led Klein toward the mature and rich poetic vision expressed at the end the Gloss: "It is a fabled city that I seek:/ It stands in Space's vapours and Time's haze."

Gloss Beth consists of a lamentation over the death of the six million martyrs. It culminates in an emotional outbreak of hatred and curses upon the heads of the murderers.

Gloss Gimel is a poetic interpretation of Michelangelo's paintings in the Sistine Chapel in Rome that were mentioned in the story. A parallel is drawn between the Jewish idea of the divinity of man in which killing even one man is akin to deicide, and the Nazi notion of divinity, which aspired to be godlike in death and in destruction.

Gloss Dalet, a dramatic poem, is a representation of the plea of the Jewish People for acceptance, recognition among the nations and reconciliation with their Semitic brethren, the Arabs.

Finally, Gloss Hay concludes with a series of beautiful but simple individual and collective prayers ending with the 13th Psalm of David.

To summarize, A.M. Klein succeeded with The Second Scroll in creating a work of literature that has beauty of form and structure and rich, particularist and universal content.

Desmond Pacey's statement about Klein's capacity through poetry to control the flow of his rhetoric to write in a brief, epigrammatic manner can be applied to the prose in The Second Scroll as well. Here, even more than in his poetry, "humour and pathos, admiration and sarcasm are blended in a most piquant and often poignant amalgam."

Klein was surely intoxicated with words. His rich vocabulary is drawn from Yiddish and Hebrew idioms combined with Elizabethan or Joycean rhetoric. These, however, do not cloud the content or impair the force of his ability to express. They only add to the beauty of this original literary masterpiece.

Simcha Simchovitch is a poet and essayist and one of Canada's most renowned Yiddish writers. His most recent collection of poetry is The Fiery Mountain – Collected Poems.

Passover Greetings

United in Joy

By ORITTE RUDSKI

Round and round we dance together

United in Joy

So many kinds of Jews

So many kind of joy,

Why do we need them all?

The young Yeshiva bachurim twirl around

United in their Torah Joy.

They love the Torah,
the challenge of its study and the love exchanged between them and their creator
As they embrace his holy words.

Oh, how they dance!
They love to lock arms and twirl around
Carrying the young ones tenderly on their shoulders
And the Torah proudly in their arms.

Like the Esrog of Succos
Full of flavor and sweet aroma

They are proud to be Torah Jews!

But what is a royal Esrog without a Lulov, surrounded by Haddasim and Arravos?
A lonely citron unable to Serve its creator properly!!

So round and round the Bimah dance the elderly Chassidim.

They love the Torah and its creator dearly,

But this one has a heart condition,

That one has an aching back,

And his friend has a sore leg!
Never mind, today we serve our Lord by dancing

And so they dance
With strength they do not have!

The body may be weak
But the soul is strong
So the dance goes on in Joy!!

And then there are those Whose love of Torah is hidden
In shame, in rebellion, in moral pain.

They have come to dance and to drink,
Because that is what they know and love.

Round and round they go
L'chaim they drink

Passover Greetings

They laugh, they join hands
Embracing their fellow Jews
And their holy Torah.

Tonight there is no need for study,

No need for holy thoughts and words.

We can serve our Lord

With the soles of our feet

That dance round and round,

With the palms of our hands

That hold on to our brothers.

Every Jew has a role to play tonight!

And just as the perfect Esrog can complete its holy mission
By uniting with the other Kinds

All Jews dance together
With Torah scholars

And we become one.

Just as the Lord is one
We serve as one.

Just as we shake the lulov
Up down and all around
And make it dance
To the tune of the time of our happiness,

We are the Lulov and and Esrog of Hashem.

As we circle the bimah with his Torah,
Round and round.
United in Joy.

Flies and Hedgehogs

By IDDO GEFEN

For Jonathan

Since you joined the army, I am trying to catch the time. Simply to hold on to it. I extend my hands into space, waiting for the minutes to pass through the fingers, and then I close them as quickly as I can, trying to gather as many of them as possible. At first, I could not catch anything, because catching the time is complicated. Even catching flies, which are much clumsier, I could not manage to learn from you.

And I remember you. How you used to come home on Fridays, after standing guard for three days, hardly able to move. We would sit by the table, and Mom and Dad would not touch their food until you finished at least two servings. And after dinner, we would sit in the living room and you told us about how Itay talks on the phone the whole time, and about Weisman, the commander, and how you and Uri play tricks on him. And you kept telling us how safe it was at the base, even safer than here up north. And then, only after they were sure that this is in fact their child, and not some impostor or some fantasy, they would look at each other, just for a second, and you could even imagine them smiling. Their child has lived through another week.

'You would run around the house, with me following you like a shadow'

And in the evening you would run around the house, with me following you like a shadow. You are shaving to go out with the gang, but specially for Meital. She does not like that you are thorny like a hedgehog. And when you hear the light switch in their room going off, you come up to me and whisper that now you can tell me that this week a terrorist almost made it into the base, while Itay was on guard, and only by pure chance Weisman caught him. And that maybe in two weeks, you will be sent for a mission. You make me promise not to tell them, because Mom is under enough pressure, and it is bad for Dad's blood pressure, but that I should know. Because in a few years I will also be there, and I should not think that the service is so innocent, and be shocked when they shove an M-16 into my hands.

And I try to learn it all. Every advice, every warning, and every word in this new military language of yours. Even the tricks you played on Weisman I remember. Then, when you are ready to go out, you ask me what about this girl I told you about. I tell you I have been busy. You ask me what was I so busy with, and I stand there, embarrassed, almost stuttering, and tell you I have been trying to catch the time. "The last thing an eight-year-old kid needs is time," you tell me. "And besides, what will you do with it?"

And I did not really know what to say, so you ask me how I tried to do that. I show you, and you measure the distance between my hands, the speed of the movement and the strength of the grip. "Well, no wonder you cannot do it – you have no patience at all." And then you show me with your big hands how to wait patiently until enough time sinks in between the hands, even though you are already half an hour late. "Don't worry, with all these guard duties I have plenty of time – I will save some for you."

'And then there was this day, when Mom was glued to the news and Dad was just silent'

And then there was this day, when Mom was glued to the news and Dad was just silent, smoking in spite of the blood pressure. And I was a bit bored, so I played with the time. And suddenly I felt it. A piece slipped though my fingers. It was small, almost invisible, but for a moment I knew I had held on to a slice of time. Dad, who did not understand what I was doing, yelled at me that I should grow up and stop behaving like a small child, and went back to his cigarette. Mom came to me later, and told me he did not mean it, but I knew he did.

From that moment I did not stop catching the time. Tearing small pieces from it, but larger and larger each time. And the time, it did not like my taking pieces. I tried to explain that it was infinite and I only needed a few small pieces, but time does not make concessions to anyone and fought with me for every single moment. I only tried to put some pieces into a plastic bottle. Sometimes some of the pieces managed to escape, and even those which stayed tried to get out the whole night. Because time never gives up.

All through the shivah I was busy filling up bottles. All your friends came. Even Weisman came, and even he cried. Meital did not come yet, but do not worry. I am sure she will come, because in spite of what you think she loves you, even though you feel like a hedgehog.

'I looked at all the pictures again and again'

They all come to comfort us, and in their faces a mix of embarrassment and pity. I try to look as mature and serious, but I never even listened to them. I was just busy trying to catch time with my hands. It made Dad angry, but he did not tell me anything. Only after the guests would leave and the house became empty, I would hear them fight. I am not that special anymore, because they fight now about anything at all and scream at each other so hard that the neighbours hear it, but they pretend they do not. And then at some point they become silent – they do not even have the strength to fight.

And at the moment when I put the last piece of time in the bottle, I went to your room, where for a whole month no one had been. I looked at your guitar, at your Beatles records piled up, at the Catcher in the Rye by your bed with its bookmark almost at the end, just in case you had time to read. And then, finally, I looked at your pictures-board. The one Mom prepared for your birthday. I looked at all the pictures again and again, a thousand times. I touched and felt each one, comparing them all, looking for the right one. I finally chose the one we took at the beach on your birthday, with everyone in it. Mom and Dad in the middle, and you holding Meital with one hand and giving me a slap on the back with the other. And then I slowly took the picture from the wall, laid it on the bed and opened the bottle. I quickly poured all the time that was left on the picture and for three seconds went back to that moment. I did not really remember how hard that slap was...

And now I have improved my technique, and I manage to fill three bottles a day (flies I can catch now even with one hand, but I let them go so that their parents will not fight). I am working on a new plan now. It does interfere with school, and I don't have so much time for friends, and everyone thinks it is nonsense messing with all these boxes and bottles that fill up my room. If they had the strength to tell me off, they would. But they don't. Still, I know that if you only came to see it, you would understand my plan at once. To fill this house with time, so much time to last a whole lifetime. Not just for me, but for Dad, whose blood pressure is not good, and for Mom, who cries too much. And with all the time we will be able to spend with you, maybe we will be able to live, and not stay forever in one moment that does not move.

Passover Greetings

A Sabbath State of Mind

By JENNIFER (JINKS) HOFFMANN

In a Sabbath state state of mind
I walk to Shul.
It is a fierce and blustery day.
The Breath of Life, Ruach Ha-Olam is not always gentle.
I am thinking of Mitzrayim
my heart choked by the ill-health of the economy, and of someone I love.
My consciousness is indeed constricted.
In Torah study, we examine Ki Tisa, the parshah where Moses receives and then shatters the first set of tablets,
the initial decalogue.
The Rabbi offers a teaching I sorely need:
the Mishkan, the Holy Ark, contains both the whole set of tablets,
and shards of the broken stones.
Thus is it with us:
we offer to God, we bring to the Breath of Life
both our wholeness and our brokenness.

We move to the sanctuary for Shabbat worship, in a Sabbath state of mind.
I listen hungrily for God in the liturgy.

Aliyot are assigned.
I pray silently that I will be called to the Bimah.
I am not.
The Torah reading begins.
One after another the worshipers walk slowly to the front of the Shul and begin to chant their blessings:
Boruch Atoy Adonoy…
Hebrew with Polish or Russian undertones.
And all at once I see my father,
my Father's Father, and his Father, blessings upon the Torah,
reaching back through generation upon generation, from Johannesburg in South Africa,
from Toronto in Canada, backwards, backwards, backwards to a shtetl in Poland or in Russia.
Boruch Atoy Adonoy…
And I weep.
Our God and God of our fathers…
I pull Ruach Ha Olam closer and whisper thank You.
In my heart
I have been called to the Torah.

APOLOGY TO DANIEL

By ROBERTA SWETLOW

I heard those four words, hidden in the Hair Care aisles, when old-man voices grumbled about prices of supplements.

"Costs too much," then the reply, accusing stinginess in a question meant,

I'm sure, to be innocent banter between friends laughing, the accusation denied, the conversation continued as

I gasped quietly and knew it wouldn't matter
if they saw me.

They used those words

as a common expression, nothing offensive, not hostile as when terrorists asked Daniel Pearl that question and he answered, as I would/should have answered from the aisle,

"I am a Jew"

but even if I had overcome my disbelief, grown strong in righteous anger they still would not think they had erred except, perhaps, in failing to see, protruding above the shelf, my horns.

THE METZERITZER AND THE PRISONER

By GEORGE BERNSTEIN

The Metzeritzer Rebbe used humour
As one would use a nutcracker —
To break open the shells in which Men encase themselves:
As his listeners came apart in laughter
The Metzeritzer penetrated
To their secret hearts
Bathing them in holiness.

Thus the Great Maggid: "Our sages teach:
'When man forgets his virtues
God remembers them,
When man remembers his virtues
God forgets them,
When man forgets his sins
God remembers them,
When man remembers his sins
God forgets them!'

"To what may this be compared?
To the king of a great land
So concerned for his subjects
That he visited a prison in his realm
To speak with those incarcerated there
Hoping to turn them from their sinful ways.
Of the hundreds there entombed
Each protested he was innocent.
One alone admitted guilt,
Accepting punishment
As part of his atonement.

FOR THE LOVE OF ISRAEL

By ESTHER GESSER

When I returned,
You rejoiced with water
For my bread
And for my wine;
And for the jasmine
That I planted everywhere
For your delight;
Now the wind brings
Into my open window
The smell of jasmine
With the morning light.

THE SEA OF GALILEE AT NIGHT

By ESTHER GESSER

Suddenly the mist was gone.
There was no moon nor stars,
Yet it was light;
I could see into the valley—
There was the Sea;
And I was there
Like light that could not be,
And yet was there.

The Kindness Backpack

By SANDRA JACK-MALIK

Once upon a time, there was a short, white-haired man. He was the father of five children, the grandfather of many and great-grandfather of a few. He was a powerfully built, compact man who worked constructing roads. Each day at 5 p.m., his steps lightened as he left his office and walked the short distance home to his family.

This man was born in Romania during a time when all things sane, including himself, had been thrust inside a bottle, tightly corked and shaken violently. He lived through war, Hitler, concentration camps, sickness and skin-ripping loss, all the while sloshing inside the blood-stained liquid.

In the end, with the bottle shattered to ragged fragments, he willed himself in the direction of Israel, for he was a Jew. As he moved from country to country across a wounded and weeping Europe, he carried only those things that fit inside a small canvas backpack that had been given to him by a Red Cross nurse in a camp.

When he finally reached Israel, he settled in the north along the border with Lebanon, and there he met and married Tal, a beautiful Israeli woman. She tended to his ragged, broken bits, and over time, he emerged as a man capable of love and devotion to a single entity, his family.

A few days before his first child, Rachelle was 13, the man drove the short distance into a neighbouring town and purchased the most magnificent backpack money could buy. He brought it home, and in the quiet, loving comfort of his home, he presented it to his eldest child. She sat perfectly still next to her father as he told her the story of his journey across Europe to Israel.

"Rachelle," he said, "when the war was over, I was very lucky because one day, I met a kind and generous woman who gave me a brown backpack for my journey. In it I put everything I needed to discover new places, meet new friends and learn new things."

"Abba," Rachelle whispered, "what was inside?"

"Warm clothes, two books and many, many hopes and dreams," Abba whispered.

"What kind of hopes and dreams, Abba?"

"Rachelle, I dreamed about the things we had forgotten."

"What kinds of things, Abba?"

"Mostly I dreamt of kindness."

"What will I put in my backpack, Abba?"

"That is for you to think about and decide."

On the night before the child was to begin her first day of high school, her father asked if she had decided what she would put in her backpack.

"Yes, Abba, it's all ready," she chirped happily.

"May I have a look?" he asked, smiling.

"Of course, Abba," and she ran into her small room to retrieve it.

When she came into the living room, she gently laid the backpack down on the table. Her father was silently pleased to see how she handled it with care. She reached inside and tenderly took out a small, silver picture frame. She held it in her hands with the glass facing down. Her father wondered what picture she had chosen to fill her frame. When she turned it over, he was stunned to silence, for there in the picture frame was a bright red swastika, the hated symbol of Nazi Germany.

The man felt his legs spring into action as he instinctively moved to snatch the frame from his child's hands. In a second of clarity, he froze and stiffly settled down into the chair. In a voice unlike anything Rachelle had ever heard, he quietly barked, "Rachelle! Why have you chosen that?"

The child walked around the table and laid her perfect hand on her Abba's shoulder and whispered, "Abba, I never want to forget to be kind."

Hearing those words, he took his daughter into his arms and consumed her, breathing in her goodness and in so doing, healing one more of his ragged bits. Rachelle carried her backpack for all of her high school years, her army posting and then as she began her university studies. Over the years, she received new bags, but they were always graciously accepted and then in time donated to charity. Rachelle had exactly the backpack she needed, and inside it, in the small pocket on the left side, there was an image of hatred that reminded her of her Abba and their joint desire for kindness.

My Wedding Dress

By RACHEL PIUTI

Uncle Fishel had bought tickets for Die Fledermaus at the Stuttgart Opera House. He insisted that we should all be dressed properly for the occasion. Thus, Uncle Fishel, my sister Sala and I went on an expedition to procure suitable dress-fabric – not an easy feat in postwar Germany – and find a good dressmaker.

Uncle Fishel was doing some small trading and was earning a bit of money to supplement the rations that the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) was giving us. Thanks to his trading contacts, he got the address of a Mr. Bauer who was selling fabrics at his apartment.

'I remembered the taste of the sweet Passover wine from home'

The three of us went there and were dazzled by the display of silks, cottons and woollens, all bursting with colours in floral and geometric patterns. It was truly a difficult choice to make. Sala and I finally settled on more subdued fabrics; Sala picked a sky blue wool georgette, and I too opted for the georgette, but in a royal blue shade. We were very pleased as we carried the materials home.

Next day, we went to a dressmaker recommended by a friend of Uncle's. She lived in a second-floor apartment of a four-storey building on a quiet tree-lined street. We were shown into a spacious room. On a small round table, in the middle of the room, were a couple of magazines, their open pages showing the latest styles in dresses. A subtle aroma of fabrics and perfumes lingered in the air. It brought back memories from before the war, of going with my mother to the dressmaker, of choosing a pattern, and the excitement of getting a new dress. But it was better not to think about that. We were here to have dresses made for the opera.

The dressmaker was a slim, middle-aged lady; she was helpful and seemed competent. We spent about an hour turning pages and looking at all the beautiful dresses. When we finally settled on styles and she took our measurements, we departed feeling that our dresses were in good professional hands.

We went for a try-on a week later. Even though the fabric was still in pieces: skirt, top and sleeves separate – the dressmaker pinned them together on me while I was standing in front of the mirror – it already felt luxurious.

The dresses were ready a few days after that, and Uncle Fishel came with us to pick them up. We tried them on at the dressmaker's salon and called him in to the fitting room so he could see us in our dresses. His face beamed with pride, and I felt like a princess. My dress had a shawl collar that came down to the waist and a flared skirt. The royal blue colour intensified my blue eyes.The fabric was so finely woven that it felt as soft as silk.

We were all there on the night of the opera: Uncle Fishel with his sons, Mike and Ben, and Sala and I. We all lived together in a two-bedroom apartment. Uncle Fishel was our mother's cousin and he considered himself our guardian, since our parents did not survive the war. The two families had always been very close.

Die Fledermaus was beautiful and funny; it was my first operetta. The atmosphere in the opera house was exalted. The audience, all in evening attire, looked festive and distinguished. I felt comfortable in my lovely dress. No hand-me-downs from the UNRWA tonight, I thought.

It was January 1946 when I got my new dress. Later, I wore it to the Saturday night dances in our Displaced Persons' camp. An orchestra played and most of us attended – the young and the not so young.

Sala and I left Stuttgart at the beginning of April. We were on our way to Palestine with the Aliya Beth. But we were delayed in Italy for a whole year. The people of the underground organization who were charged with getting us to Palestine kept moving us from place to place. Whether intentional or not, we got to see a big chunk of Italy. We made many lasting friendships, and many of us fell in love and married. I was one of those.

Paul and I met shortly after our arrival in Italy. Our Stuttgart group had been in the village of Aqua Santa only a couple of days when a group from Zeilzheim arrived. Among them were Meir and Mila, a couple we knew from Germany. They introduced us to their friends, and we became one big family. Paul was one of those new friends. We started going for long walks in the hilly countryside; we went to the tavern in the village and drank local wine. It was dry, and I didn't like it at first. I remembered the taste of the sweet Passover wine from home. But it was cheap, and the people were friendly. They talked, they sang, and Paul sang with them – he had a beautiful voice.

'We opened the door and an amazing sight met my eyes'

From then on we travelled as a group from place to place as the need arose.

We spent the summer months in Rome. We explored the sights and we even had an audience with Pope Pius XII. The meeting had been arranged through the Joint Distribution Committee. About 20 of us went to the Vatican, we were shown into a reception room and the pope blessed us in Hebrew.

We lived on Via Latina, in a lovely but neglected villa that stood in a luscious garden with a fountain, in which we washed our clothes. The rooms were unfurnished, but we were given folding cots and straw mattresses. Eight girls shared one room. On very hot nights, we took the mattresses to the roof and slept there.

Paul and I saw magnificent performances of Carmen and Aida in the open-air Opera Caracala, located in the ruins of the ancient Roman Baths. The sight inspired us with awe. Our group spent two weeks in Ostia, the beach resort of Rome, sleeping on a hotel roof, awaiting our departure to Palestine on a ship that never came. Yet, we had a wonderful time, swimming and sailing in the blue sea during the day, chatting and singing on the roof at night.

The rabbi would not marry us without my going to the mikvah

We lived for a time in a medieval castle in the town of Tradate, a half hour's ride by train from Milan. Many young Jewish people were waiting there for their turn to go illegally to Palestine. Most belonged to political movements ranging from the left to the right. Our group of about 50 consisted of people of various political persuasions who came from Germany to Italy. We went under the name of "Partisans," because some former partisans were among us.

The castle stood in a park-like setting with a profusion of flowers and shrubbery amid winding paths. On the main floor were reception rooms and a ballroom with marble floors and gilded mirrors on the walls. The bedrooms were on the second and third floors. It was romantic in the late summer and early fall, with the windows looking out on the park, but by October the castle was as cold as a dungeon.

One afternoon while the two of us were enjoying the warm sun on a bench in the garden, Paul asked me: "Will you marry me?"

I pretended to think for a few minutes, then said, "Yes, I will."

Next day, Paul got in touch with a rabbi in Milan, and a date was set for our wedding. We were to meet the rabbi in his study on the third of December.

There was also the not-so-minor problem of going to a mikvah. I did not expect this! I did not believe in it! I considered myself a modern, emancipated young woman! But there was no help for it. The rabbi would not marry us without me having dunked myself in the mikvah.

Someone had to come with me to make sure that I immersed myself totally. Not even a hair could remain out of the water. Mrs. Silkowski, a devout little woman who knew Paul from Lodz and who kept telling me how lucky I was to be getting such a fine man from such a respectable family for a husband, took on the task of escorting me to the mikvah and of making sure that everything was kosher. Sure enough, after I surfaced, gasping for air, I had to immerse myself again, because a couple of hairs were sticking out of the water.

With this ordeal over, I began thinking: what would I wear to my wedding? I opened my backpack and pulled out the royal blue dress. I hadn't worn it for a long time. I went down to the laundry room and ironed the dress carefully. It still looked very attractive.

We went to the rabbi's study in the early afternoon. It was a cold and rainy day. My sister Sala and her husband Icchak (they had been married a few months earlier), and our friends Meir and Mila, were our witnesses. Four young men in kippot held up the chupah. We following the rabbi's instructions: Paul stood under the chupah while Sala and Mila led me around Paul three times. Then came the vows, the breaking of the glass, and the rabbi read the ketubah. The rabbi's wife served wine and cake.

We came back to Tradate at dusk. The two couples suggested that we peek into the ballroom to see if anything was happening there. We opened the door and an amazing sight met my eyes. On tables covered in white cloth stood candles, bottles of wine, platters of food and baskets of fruit. Our friends, our family for almost a year, greeted us with cheers. An orchestra on the podium began to play dance music, and soon everybody was whirling around the ballroom. I was dancing in the royal blue dress which, that night, had become my wedding dress

Light

By CLAUDIA GOLDMAN

Light creeps in between the wooden slats of the blinds.

"The Israel Defense Forces started bombing at 11:30 this morning, their time," my husband mutters.

It's Shabbat, they've gone for surprise.

I slide out of warm sheets. Looking out at the snow, the list of family and friends that could be involved scrolls down behind my eyes. No one is doing active military service now. They're between children; the older ones are finished and the younger ones are too young.

"Ground troops?" I ask.

"Not yet."

"Why now?"

"Latest graduating class of Hamas recruits were out in the open."

I contemplate the mounds of snow in the backyard and then look up at the grey sky. I imagine a spark of light hanging in the air. It moves toward me, coming straight for the window. There is a shrieking whistling and then splintering glass as the Qassam rocket pierces my body, landing on the bed behind me.

Thoughts of fear float in the air like snowflakes, drifting downwards, gathering at my feet.

The day crawls past, accompanied by the murmuring of BBC in the background.

Sunday dawns and drags until nightfall. Chanukah begins; the Jewish historical holiday that marks the celebration of religious freedom.

We gather for the lighting of the first of eight days of Chanukah candles. The flame brings a shaft of light into the darkness of Vancouver winter.

"What's the weather like?" I ask.

"Cloudy. We still haven't had any rain yet this year, but they say we're getting some today," my Israeli cousin answers from her cellphone.

CNN pours updates from our TV: 6500 reservists have been called up. They and their tanks are lined up along the border.

We have family members in elite units of the Reserves. I do another head count and begin to turn the worry wheel.

Hamas flies their Grad rocket 40 kilometres to Be'er Sheva, demolishing an eight storey apartment building. Their net is widening.

Screams shriek in my head.

Israel flattens the Gaza police station, the television station and Hamas headquarters.

Hamas spits more rockets into the Israeli town of Ashdod.

Israel demolishes Hamas government buildings that were built with money from abroad.

Lighting all eight candles on the final night of Chanukah, I stare through the light, out the window and into our front yard. Snowflakes flip and flap in the cold darkness.

The wind whistles, slamming a rocket into my forehead. The pain splits my skull.

Chanukah has come and gone, and the darkness settles over us.

"They got him," my husband says.

"Who?"

"Nizar Qayyan. He's a major political and military leader in Hamas."

The CTV television announcer talks while the camera slowly turns in a circle. The building where Qayyan lived is a smoking pile of concrete and metal. The surrounding area is intact, but the windows of the buildings have been blown out and you can see the blackened signs of smoke.

I read in the Vancouver Sun newspaper, "Thirteen other members of Qayyan's family, including his four wives, died in the strike." According to his teenaged son, Baraa, "Two more children are missing and presumed dead." Baraa adds, "We are patient, and we are committed to the resistance." According to the article, "Nizar Qayyan advocated suicide bombings, and sent his own 22-year-old son to his death in an attack on an Israeli settlement."

My husband asks, "Did you see? They didn't just drop leaflets this time warning civilians to get away from Hamas buildings?"

"What do you mean?"

"They accessed cellphones in the Gaza Strip and left voice mails warning people to evacuate."

"Hmm," I answer. "That's pretty high tech."

Snow continues throughout the week. Vancouver breaks all records for snowfall. Frustration is mounting, as people feel trapped by the weather.

This morning CBC announces Day Eight of the Israeli operation. The eight days of Operation Cast Lead.

Staring into the late afternoon darkness I feel the weight of the absence of light.

Another generation of Arab and Jewish children will grow in the darkness of hatred. I ask myself, how can we strike the match that will light a new candle of hope?

How can we light the ninth candle of Chanukah?

SWALLOWS

By CAROL KATZ

The cave was dark and too cold for 38 Ukrainian Jews who never saw light

or birds

for 344 days

they hid from the Nazis in a cave named Priests' Grotto.

They dreamed of swallows, proud, free.

They dreamed of wings to fly.

But each day they woke to dampness, night.

When they were freed
by the Russians

they shielded their eyes from the brightness.

Later they saw a colony of swallows travelling together, and knew it was possible to be free without wings.

A last friend

By ERIC SHORE,
Grade 8 Student at the Toronto Heschel School

Unnoticed,
he walks up behind them,
and watches the scene:

A father dressed in black as if he knows someone is about to die.
On the altar beside him,
Lies a boy,
tied tight as a pair of tfillin.
staring up at his dad,
his eyes are full of wonder and hope…

the dad raises his knife.
tears slide d o
w
n his cheek like rain on a gloomy day.
The boy's eyes grow large with terror.

SUDDENLY!!

The ram knows what he must do, to stop a tragedy before all is lost…

He steps from the thicket,
– his friend saying a last farewell –

into the stillness of an everlasting sleep .

His final thought:

"Peace… peace at last."

Figgy Pudding

By ELLIE CLAVIER

There can be little doubt that of all the 28 children in Mrs. Glickman's Grade 3 class, not one of us knew what figgy pudding was. Indeed we weren't quite sure if Mrs. Glickman knew herself.

Yet every Christmas, there we were, eager disciples of Van Horne School, gem of the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal, joyously proclaiming our love for this mysterious yuletide treat. We would raise our innocent voices in joyful chorus, belting out, as only primary school children can, a hearty rendition of the Victorian Christmas carol We Wish You a Merry Christmas. Partygoers, mentioned in the lyrics, won't go until they get some, so we knew that figgy pudding was something very special.

> We knew it was something very special

Then again, our whole holiday repertoire was filled with special mysteries. What did wassail taste like? What exactly were you supposed to do with the holly and the ivy? Who on earth was good King Wenceslas and when did he last look out? These were questions never asked and so never answered because we all had a sense that we were being treated to something that wasn't exactly for us.

To be sure we were given hymn books and taught the Lord's Prayer, which we were required to recite fervently each and every morning, with hands clasped behind our backs and heads bowed. We all knew our father who art in heaven, Harold be thy name, just as surely as we knew that God must shave our gracious queen and that we must pledge allegiance to this flag and to the commonwealth for which it stands.

We gloria'd this and dominun'd that, praised the Christ child and sang about three kings of Orient are that tried to smoke a rubber cigar. We marched onward with Christian soldiers and even climbed Jacob's bladder, but somewhere in the back of our eight-year-old minds was the ever-present knowledge that the majority of the 28 children in Mrs. Glickman's Grade 3 class were Jewish. As were a good part of the rest of the school and many of the teachers.

> 'Basking in our country's great diversity and freedom'

To our minds, the decorating of the shiny tree in the back of the classroom with colourful crystal ornaments, the paper angels we so lovingly designed, the exchange of velvet and sparkly Christmas stickers, and yes, the singing of those cryptic Christmas carols, were all gifts that were shared with us, and as such, they were treasured. Just as we treasured our own holidays at home replete with colourful candles on sparkling chanukiyahs, crispy potato latkes, spinning dreidels and Chanukah gelt.

We didn't worry that we were English speaking in a French province or that we were Jewish in a Protestant school. We didn't worry about language police or reasonable accommodation. We were learning to speak French, we were learning what it meant to have a different religion and different holidays. We were basking (if we'd only known it at the time) in our country's great diversity and freedom. We raised our voices in song, celebrating our great luck to have the best of all worlds.

And yes, we gleefully sang the praises of figgy pudding. Yet to learn that figgy pudding is a rare treat made up of a large number of exotic, foreign ingredients, carefully mixed with rich local ingredients, which takes an unusually long time to bake, steamed in a gentle bath over a bright flame. Yet to discover that figgy pudding is known and loved for retaining the taste of all its individual components. Yet to know that in Charles Dickens' story of Scrooge, figgy pudding is the star of the yuletide table over which Tiny Tim proclaims: "And God bless us, everyone!"

Passover Greetings

AT SIXTY

By PEARL ADLER SABAN

At sixty, one is not quite old, neither young… but somewhere in the middle.

With life lines to show,
fine wrinkles here and there,
greying hair or balding patches,
hinting age spots
and a book of photographs depicting a life.

At sixty, Israel is not quite old, neither young… but somewhere in the middle.

But in truth she is ancient – Israel is a "she," you know – and was reborn in May 1948.

Not everyone has the chance to be reborn. But Israel… she fought to be reborn.
She fought hard. Her supporters fought harder.

From desert sands and barren fields, she brought forth life.

From stark greyness, she brought forth greens and blues.

From a handful of devotees, she yielded multitudes of lovers.
Lovers of her country.
Lovers of her language.
Lovers of her culture.
Lovers of the blue and white of her draping flag.

Lovers of "Hatikvah."
Hope. Forever sustaining Israel.
Forever sustaining…

ALEYNU

By MURRAY CITRON

It is our joy in all our days
The Master of all things to praise;
To tell the greatness of the One
By Whose design all was begun;
For not like the nations are we made,
Or like the tribes of earth arrayed.
Our lot is not as theirs assigned,
Our fate is of a different kind;
For eager in the truth are we,
And proud of our Lord, we bow the knee.
Our hearts are bowed, and worshipping,
We thank and bless our perfect King
Who governs kings, Whose Holiness
It is our choice and gift to bless,
Who spreads forth galaxies and skies,
For Whom the worlds' foundation rise,
Whose Presence over us we feel,
Glorious, majestic, real.
This is our God, our Lord, our pride,
Our King of truth, there is none beside.
For the Torah tells, and all shall know,
In heaven above, on earth below,
And in each heart, the Torah tells,
There is one God, there is none else.

We therefore look, our Lord, to Thee,
That soon Thy Splendour we may see,
False gods destroyed, and from this earth,
Abominations driven forth,
A perfect, happy world again,
Under the Almighty's reign,
When all mankind Thy Name will call
And turn from wickedness, and all
Will see and know and realize
Each knee must bend, all voices rise,
To hail thy glorious governance,
Free of the whims of time and chance.
To all the nations see it spread,
As it is written, it is said:
When all hateful things are gone,
The Lord is One, His Name is One.

Dear Lord

By STANLEY HERBERT WEISBERG

Dear Lord as I breathe my last
I have been dying to ask.

Were there only these seven gates to heaven?
Where the Jews became Your Chosen?

Were you there at Sobibor when they
Slammed shut the gas chamber doors?

Perhaps you were busy at Belzec with those Gasping for air that was not there?

Or did you go to the Shvitz with the doomed at Auschwitz?

Or were You a tourist at Treblinka
To witness German law for the Jews of Warsaw?

Or were You with the chained at Chelmo
With the unlucky lads from Lodz?

Or did you see the Stormtroopers at Stutthof
And with your eyes see Your children die?

Or were you there with the murdered at Majdanek?
Did You hear did You feel their pain?

Dear Lord be honest with me.
I must know. If You were not there.

Where were You?

PASSOVER MEMORIES

By DOROTHY GOLDWATER

At the tender age of four I welcomed Elijah at our door.
That act had a magic appeal making it appear very real.
When I reached the age of nine, I drank four cups of wine,
Which made me fall asleep. The seder became too deep.
In my teens I knew that Passover really means
More than tasty victuals and strictly followed rituals.

Freedom is a birthright, won through a Nation's might Wholly dedicated to one God, symbolized by Moses' rod
Unity and freedom achieved by a Nation, not aggrieved
By disunity or disbelief, but, a strong caring community.

Our truly miraculous rebirth fills us with joyful mirth.
A nation in our homeland is an achievement so grand
Yet, there is an ominous cloud and thunder so loud,
Blocking the bright sunshine, threatening our land so fine.
Again we must defend our name and survive the enemy's game
Of hatred and suppression and constant libelous denigration!

The words repeated each year recall suffering and fear
When the Egyptians were our foes and caused us woes,
But God came to our relief, giving us constant belief.
This must ring loudly in our ears, quelling all our fears.

With faith in our history and trust in its mystery,
Yearly, in all corners of the Earth, Jews sing with mirth.
No matter how many seders we attend, magic does descend
On all the guests who, in the spirit of freedom, do attend.

Passover Greetings

Destined to happen

By SAUL ZAJDEL

He had heard the whole thing. He was behind the general's office quarters. A German officer came bursting in.

"Mein General, the Americans are coming! They are almost at the gates! What shall we do with the prisoners?"

"Shoot them," the general had said. "Shoot them." A few moments later, bursts of machine-gun fire could be heard. Thousands of prisoners fell to their death, all because of the two words that the general had uttered.

There was no reason for this cruel massacre. Berlin had fallen. Hitler was dead. Why had the general done this?

In time, the Americans succeeded in breaking into the camp. They thought they had come as saviours. As it turned out, they came as gravediggers. The stench of rotting corpses could already be smelled. Thousands upon thousands of bodies lay strewn across the prison grounds.

Alexander Dubkov was the sole survivor. He had been hiding behind the general's quarters.

The Americans now had to start arresting all the prison guards and prison officers. Dubkov was there when they arrested the general, who, during the whole commotion, had remained in his quarters.

Dubkov never forgot the face of the general when the Americans led him away; it showed fear, cringing fear, almost terror. Dubkov understood quite clearly the face of the general. When the general was in control of things, when he wielded power, he was brave, fearless, but when the tables were turned, he was as meek as a lamb.

The war was now finally over. Millions of people had died. But at least the Allies won. Now came the task of trying those who had committed such heinous crimes – crimes that even the German people could not believe happened. But they had happened.

Among those on trial was the general of the prison camp where Dubkov had been interned. Alexander Dubkov wanted only to see the general die. Alexander Dubkov was living only in order to see the general die.

The trial began. Everyone was tried. And so, the general, whose crime was considered to be a small one, had to wait his turn. Alexander Dubkov also waited his turn.

Finally, it came time for the general to face the judge. The prosecution's sole evidence was that of one Alexander Dubkov, who had heard with his own ears the general clearly say, without any hesitation, "Shoot them."

The defence argued that the general never said this. The defence said that another officer had made the order, that since Dubkov was behind the building, he could not see the person who gave the order. "Perhaps it was another general that gave the order," argued the defence.

What it boiled down to was the word of some prisoner, who wanted to see the general executed no matter what might happen to himself, against the word of a "respected" general who said he never made the order.

The judge had no choice but to declare the general innocent of this crime. All they found him guilty of were some small, petty crimes. For these, the judge imposed a two-year sentence. If he behaved, he would be able to go free in eight months.

Alexander Dubkov had heard and seen all of this. To the casual observer, Dubkov still seemed relaxed, even calm. Outwardly no signs of distress could be seen. But inside, Alexander Dubkov was raging. He had been practically accused of lying. But that was not why Dubkov was agitated. It was because the general, who, without any thought, mercilessly ordered the slaughter of thousands of human beings – many of them his family and close friends – had been found innocent. That such a killer would soon be allowed total freedom to go and live where he wanted, when he wanted. His heart cried out to the injustice of it all. Alexander Dubkov could not rest until this murderer was brought to justice. A hatred burned inside him that could not be silenced until the general himself was silenced.

And so, Dubkov would do nothing with himself. All he could think of was the general and what he would do to him when he was released. There was sometimes a conflict within himself between two voices. One voice would say, "What are you trying to do to yourself? Hasn't there been bloodshed? Hasn't there been enough killing? What's done is done. You can't change the past. It indeed was a horrible thing, but why waste your life. Give thanks to the Almighty that he spared you, and start living."

But the other voice would always say, "Are you going to let that murderer get away with it? You can't! You have an obligation to all those who died to take revenge for them. You can't let that demon remain alive." And the second voice would always win.

And so, Alexander Dubkov, sole survivor of one of the Nazi prison camps, undoubtedly saved by some Divine force, didn't live. He just existed. He didn't even try to marry. He never got a job. Night after night he would walk the streets aimlessly, going wherever his tired feet would lead him. He didn't care where he went. He was just walking. Just waiting. Day after day. Month after month. Walking, waiting.

About a year after the sentence had been imposed, the word came around to him that the general would be released in the very near future, a free man. Alexander Dubkov started making plans. Nothing fancy, just find him on the street, get him into a dark, dead-end alley and give him his just punishment.

He also decided to wait until the general had settled down, gotten married, maybe had a child or two. Wait until he had a good job, no worries. Then, punish him. So big was the hate Alexander Dubkov had for the general. He wanted to hurt not only the general himself, but his family, too. Everything that was connected with the general. Of course, he wouldn't kill the general's wife and children. But, just by killing the general himself, his family would surely also suffer. He didn't care what would happen to him. So great was Alexander Dubkov's hate for the general. Two months after Dubkov received the word about his release, the general was released.

Dubkov realized right from the beginning that he would always have to follow the general, always know his whereabouts until the right moment would come. When Dubkov saw the general being let out of the prison gates, a rush of such great hatred came to him that he knew that he must follow through to the very end.

The general had not changed much since the last time Dubkov had seen him. Still small, fat, bald on the top with hair on the sides. The thing that seemed to stand out more than any of his other features, Dubkov thought, were his eyes. Sinister looking, narrow. It seemed to Dubkov that the general's face was always in a frown.

At first, Dubkov observed, the general did not do much socializing. He rented a small room and stayed there most of the day. At night, he would sometimes take long walks across the town and come back to his room at about midnight. But, as the months passed, the general was stopping more often than not at a house. He would stay a few hours and then go back to his room. A few weeks later, Dubkov found out that the general was engaged. Two months later, the general was married.

Life passed quickly for the general now. He had gotten a job as a foreman of a small factory, he was making a decent living, and everything was going nicely. His relationship with his wife was wonderful, and a year after their marriage, they were blessed with their first child. The world never seemed a nicer place, thought the general.

Dubkov had been observing the general and his happenings all this time. After the child was born, Dubkov decided that the general must now pay for his crimes.

Dubkov went over in his mind again exactly what he was going to do. He would follow the general home from work, grab him just before he reached home, push him into an alley, shoot him in the heart and in the head, and walk away. What would happen after that would be of no consequence to Dubkov. He had done his duty.

Everything went as planned. He followed him home step by step, waiting just for the right moment. Now! He ran up to him and shoved him into the alley. They were now alone, Alexander Dubkov the unfortunate prisoner, and the general, the general who committed such atrocities against other human beings. Dubkov held the gun in his hand and shouted, "Die, you treacherous murderer," pulled the trigger, and fired, again, again, again. The general's body slumped to the ground. But no blood came out of the body! There was no body.

It had all been an illusion.

Dubkov looked at the wall where he was supposed to have seen the slumping body of the general. All he could see were four bullet holes. Dubkov looked at the gun. It was still in his trembling hand. He let go of his grip, and the gun fell with a thud on the hard ground. It had just dawned on him. He would have committed murder, the ultimate sin, just to seek revenge. Not that the general didn't deserve it, but that Alexander Dubkov didn't have the right to carry out the "execution."

"Let someone else take care of the general," thought Alexander. "Yes, let the Almighty take care of him." "From now on I will live."

And so, Alexander started to live. After a while, he got married, settled down, got a good job. A year later, he and his wife were blessed with their first child. Yes, Alexander Dubkov had finally become a man.

A few years later, while Alexander was taking a late-night walk to enjoy the cool evening air, he happened to stumble upon the same alley where fate had played a hand. A hand that he had accepted. As he stared at the wall, all the anguished memories came back to him. Oh, how he now regretted all those wasted years!

Just as he was turning to leave, there stood right in front of him, the general. The general had a gun in his hand. A split second later it was all over.

Yes, the general had been after the prisoner, Dubkov, for years. The sole survivor in my camp. The person who wanted to send me to the gallows. Such a person does not deserve to live. These are the thoughts that led the general to commit just murder. Just one more murder.

Now it was over. The general lazily made his way home. Now the general felt fulfilled. He fondled the gun that had made his life so complete. Suddenly, chillingly, the gun started rising toward the general's head! Some mysterious force was guiding his hand. The gun was at his head. The trigger was pulled. The general slumped to the floor.

The soul of Alexander Dubkov could be heard laughing, laughing, laughing.

MARKHAM

IN LOVING MEMORY

A young Israeli woman lights a candle last year at Mt. Herzl at the memorial to the family and friends they lost on their way to Israel in 1991. More than two decades after thousands of the community were brought to Israel in dramatic and clandestine operations, the Jewish State dedicated the monument commemorating the 4,000 Ethiopian Jews who perished on the journey to Israel.

Once every 28 years

Tens of thousands of men, women and children woke up at the crack of dawn on the morning of Passover eve to take part in the Blessing of the Sun. The event occurs only once every 28 years when, according to Jewish tradition, the sun reaches the exact spot it graced the heavens at the moment it was created. Countless special prayer services were conducted throughout the Jewish world. This photo captures the scene in the hills surrounding the ancient city of Safed in the hills of the Galilee. [Israel Sun photo]

Activists set to battle at Durban II

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
JTA

BRATISLAVA, Slovakia — Eight years ago, at the first UN World Conference Against Racism, pro-Israel activists endured a week of hate-filled insults, pamphlets, posters and marches in the streets of Durban, South Africa.

When they finally marched out of a forum that branded Israel genocidal and racist like apartheid South Africa, keffiyah-clad antagonists serenaded them with chants of "free, free, Palestine!"

Overwhelmed, activists vowed to prepare better the next time. That chance comes later this month: the Durban Review Conference will be held April 20 to 24 in the Swiss city of Geneva.

Palestinian supporters will hold another large street demonstration and brainstorm ways to strengthen their Israeli-apartheid movement. But this time around, Jewish groups are, among other things, sponsoring a pro-Israel rally, co-sponsoring a human-rights event that will feature Martin Luther King III and others, and organizing a Holocaust commemoration just outside the gates of the bucolic United Nations compound in Geneva.

"Some have told me the reactions now are like post-traumatic stress syndrome, because the community was so traumatized by what happened in 2001," says Felice Gaer, who attended Durban as director of the American Jewish Committee's Jacob Blaustein Institute for Human Rights. "Jewish tradition teaches us to repair the world, not turn our back on the world. So why will Jewish groups be in Geneva? To bear witness, fight back and repair the world."

Inside the actual forum, with Israel having announced its boycott long ago, each pro- and anti-Israel group will be allotted several minutes daily to address governmental delegations.

The News in Brief

Canada

CJC Recalls Rwanda

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress last week joined PAGE-Rwanda, a group for parents and friends of genocide victims in Rwanda, to mark the 15th anniversary of the Rwanda massacre. It began April 7, 1994, and over 100 days, some 800,000 Tutsis and moderate Hutus were slain by Hutu extremists.

Eating For Israel

TORONTO — Kosher restaurants in Toronto and Montreal will take part in the fifth annual America Eats for Israel fundraiser. On April 22, restaurants such as Marky's, Joe Boos, Golden Chopsticks and My Zaidy's Kosher Sushi in Toronto, and Morty's Steakhouse and Restaurant El Morocco in Montreal will donate 10 per cent of their gross revenues to American Friends of Meir Panim, which helps fund hot meals and relief centres for impoverished Israelis.

Contest Seeks Entries

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada last week launched its annual Students Human Rights Awards competition for students in grades 1 to 12. The national contest is open to young people of all backgrounds. It's seeking entries that "creatively engage youth in seeking solutions to real and pressing human rights problems" in Canada, B'nai Brith said. Prizes are awarded in four age categories. Submission deadline is May 22. Details at bnaibrith.ca.

World

Financier Charged

NEW YORK — Financier J. Ezra Merkin was charged in a civil fraud complaint alleging he misled hundreds of investors into placing $2.4 billion of their money with Bernard Madoff. The charges were brought against Merkin, who funnelled billions of dollars from non-profits and universities to Madoff through his Ascot Partners Fund, by New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo. The complaint filed April 6 doesn't allege Merkin was aware Madoff was running a Ponzi scheme, but rather that he misled investors who thought Merkin was managing the money himself.

Jailed Cleric Accused

LONDON — A Muslim cleric jailed in Britain is continuing to issue fatwas and anti-Semitic statements, a moderate Muslim organization says. The Quilliam Foundation, a counter-extremism organization, alleges that Abu Qatada, who is described in Britain as the ambassador of Al Qaeda in Europe, is continuing to send his followers hate messages, including incitements to violence and anti-Semitic statements. The British Home Office promised to investigate any breaches of security.

Rapper Honoured

NEW YORK — Rapper LL Cool J was honoured by the Foundation for Ethnic Understanding for promoting racial harmony. LL Cool J received the Joseph Papp Racial Harmony Award on April 6 at the organization's 20th anniversary benefit held at the home of Russell Simmons, the music impresario and foundation chairman. The rapper thanked "the Jewish community for what they've done for me."

Demjanjuk One Step Closer To Extradition

WASHINGTON — Ex-Nazi guard John Demjanjuk has lost a bid to stay his deportation from the United States.

The April 10 decision clears the way for him to be deported to Germany. Demjanjuk, 89, who was stripped in 2002 of his U.S. citizenship for lying about his Nazi past, had been scheduled to be deported March 29, but was granted an indefinite stay of deportation by Judge Wayne Iskra on March 27. Germany wants him extradited to try him on an indictment that includes 29,000 counts of accessory to murder. His lawyers said he would appeal the April 10 ruling this week.

Iskra, of the Federal Immigration Court in Arlington, Va., on April 6 reversed his earlier decision, saying he didn't have the jurisdiction to make it.

Iskra ruled March 29 that Demjanjuk could remain in his suburban Cleveland home while he ruled on whether deporting him to Germany would constitute "torture," a claim set forth by family members who say he's too old and sick to travel. Demjanjuk filed an appeal before the U.S. Board of Immigration Appeals on April 7.

He was accused in the early 1980s of being the notorious guard "Ivan the Terrible" at Treblinka, but he was released from jail in Israel after seven years when he couldn't be identified as Ivan beyond a reasonable doubt.

The U.S. Justice Department later reported that Demjanjuk had been a guard at Sobibor and was liable for deportation because he lied about his Nazi past to obtain U.S. citizenship. The Munich court said it had relied heavily on material provided by the U.S. Office of Special Investigations in deciding to prosecute him.

Israel's survival at stake, says Nobel laureate

Aaron Ciechanover

Country must invest more in scientific research and education: Aaron Ciechanover

Israel's very existence is at stake because the Israeli government invests far too little in scientific research and education, says Israeli Nobel Prize laureate Aaron Ciechanover.

In a dire warning during a recent visit to Toronto, the outspoken scientist declared, "If we lose our technological advantage, we may not be able to survive."

He added, "Israel doesn't have natural resources. We're floating on sand, not oil. Our only resource is human. If we don't invest in research, we'll lose everything we have."

"Or we may become a Third World country," he added in a stinging rebuke of Israeli government policy.

Ciechanover, who shared the 2004 Nobel Prize in chemistry with American Irwin Rose and Israeli Avram Hershko, issued his scathing critique in an interview at the University of Toronto, where he delivered a lecture on his groundbreaking work on protein degradation.

"Unfortunately, the Israeli government is investing less and less in scientific research and relying instead on miracles, donations from abroad. There is a lack of appreciation in the government for scientific research."

Ciechanover – a professor at the Technion in Haifa – lamented that Israel's educational system has deteriorated in recent years, judging by test results in subjects ranging from mathematics to reading comprehension.

"It's pathetic," said Ciechanover, the director of the Technion's Rappaport Faculty of Medicine and Research Institute. "It's disastrous, in my opinion. We're betraying the deepest Jewish values.

In a reference to Israel's security, he said, "We're surrounded by countries that don't recognize us. Our existence is not secure. We have to outsmart our enemies, and that will only come from education."

Again mincing no words, he observed, "Only by wisdom and cleverness can you win wars. Our defence system is completely dependent on education. Yet the president of the Technion has told me that his budget is being cut."

Ciechanover said that Israel needs peace in order to prosper. "I hope that the people who think we can live by the sword are wrong."

In a reference to the concept of territorial compromise, he said, "We have to sacrifice for peace, divide the land in some way. I want to believe that Arab mothers want their children to grow up in peace."

Asked why Israel is not dedicating sufficient funds to maintaining its universities at the highest possible academic level, he replied,

A time to recommit

From the editor's desk...

Ever since the end of World War II, Jews have believed deeply and with profound conviction, have marched, demonstrated and stood at the forefront of mass rallies and protest assemblies shouting: "Never again."

The genocide of European Jews born of the monstrously evil racism of the Nazis would "never again" be tolerated in the world – never again against Jews, nor anyone else.

So we believed. So we hoped.

To be sure, thankfully, no further genocide has been perpetrated against the Jewish People since Adolf Hitler, though this has not been for lack of effort on the part of the enemies of the State of Israel. Few people, if any, believe the Arab armies that attacked the nascent Jewish state in 1948 would not have attempted to fulfil their stated aim of driving the Jews into the sea had they defeated the Israel Defence Forces.

But, alas, as we sadly know, genocide has not disappeared from the territory of intra-human, inter-ethnic, international relations.

Last week, for example, was the 15th anniversary of the start of the genocide in Rwanda. On April 6, 1994, marauding bands of armed Hutus in Rwanda began the slaughter of rival Tutsi tribesmen, women and children. In a period of some three months, they killed more than 800,000 Tutsis; 300,000 were children.

Twenty years before Rwanda, in 1975, Khmer Rouge leader Pol Pot of Cambodia began a program of executions, forced labour and starvation of his own people that lasted some four years. He killed an estimated two million people.

Between 1992 and 1995, the Serbs of the Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina killed an estimated 200,000 Muslims in Bosnia.

A quarter century before the Holocaust, some two million Armenians living in Turkey were removed from their homes. Over a period of three years, from 1915 to 1918, an estimated 1.5 million people were killed.

Perhaps as many as 300,000 people have been killed in recent times in Darfur. Countless more remain in harm's way. And the civilized world seems incapable of preventing the genocide that proceeds apace there in the horn of Africa.

"Never again," therefore, has not been the bulwark rallying cry that we had hoped. The sincerity of our resolve has never wilted. But nor has it ever been enough to move governments, non-governmental organizations, regional alliances or the vaunted United Nations to prevent genocide.

At nightfall next week on April 20, we shall light a memorial candle to commemorate Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah (Holocaust Remembrance Day). We shall try to understand, in the limited, inadequate capabilities of the human mind and the human heart, that six million individual Jews were killed by the Nazis.

Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah is an appropriate occasion as well to renew and reaffirm the commitment to "Never again," certainly in respect of the Jewish people and, indeed, in respect of all human beings.

We who did not endure the horror and nightmare of the Holocaust cannot know, except through our imagination, what the survivors have remembered and had to live with each day of their lives.

The following poem was written by Suzanne Agasee in memory of the family whom the Nazis destroyed. She lives today in Toronto.

They knew me when...

I was born to my parents, Rochal and Isaac Najman
They knew me when I took my first breath,
They knew me when I cried,
They knew me when I cuddled into their arms
They knew me when I smiled my first smile,
When I had my first tooth,
When I stopped wearing diapers,
When I stopped nursing from my mother's breast,
When I said my first words.

I knew them when I was born,
When I took my first breath,
When I opened my eyes and saw their lovely faces,
Smiling and cooing at me.
I knew them when they cuddled me,
When they coaxed me to drink from a cup,
Take my first steps,
Hold their hands.

MY MOTHER WARNED ME TO 'BE NICE' TO THE SOLDIERS IN THE STREET.

Paris had already been invaded by the nazis
And they were billeted all over.
I listened to my mother.

My grandmother, Sara Laks, was there too. She lived with us.
My brothers Leon and Bernard completed the family picture
From January 12, 1939 when I was born
Until July 1942 when my mother and father were deported
First to Drancy, and two weeks later,
To Auschwitz.

May their memories be for blessing.

BIRKAT HACHAMAH: Despite the snow flurries, close to 100 people showed up last Wednesday at Earl Bales Park, one of three Toronto-area locations where an outdoor sunrise service for Birkat Hachamah, the Blessing of the Sun, was held. An estimated 230 people took part in the these events sponsored by the Toronto Board of Rabbis. Jewish tradition teaches that once every 28 years, the sun returns to the position it held when the universe was created. Since the sun was not visible that morning, only part of the blessing could be recited, but the service included biblical, rabbinic and talmudic texts, as well as music. Orange juice and bagels were served to participants, donated by Toronto businesses. Here, at right, Rabbi Michal Shekel and Ryan Leszner lead the ceremony.

JIAS gets grant to help Russians integrate

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS) has received a $150,000 grant from the Moscow-based Genesis Philanthropy Group to launch a pilot project in Ottawa, Calgary and Vancouver aimed at helping Russian Jews become active in their local Jewish communities.

Genesis' mission is to develop and enhance Jewish identity among Russian-speaking Jews worldwide.

The project, JIAS Opportunity for Leadership Training (JOLT: Leadership Bridging Cultures), the only Canadian project funded by Genesis, started up in January and includes eight monthly training sessions and an internship in a Jewish agency.

Topics include connecting participants with their local Jewish communities, educating local communities about the Russian Jewish experience, deepening Russian Jews' own sense of Jewish identity, and fostering relationships among emerging Russian Jewish leaders and the established Jewish community.

Mila Voihanski, JIAS' executive director, said the agency began planning the project about two years ago out of a concern that Russian Jews were not engaging in the community.

"We had heard from both sides. The Jewish community said that Russian Jews were not active, and the Russian Jews said that they were never accepted. The time had come to begin a dialogue that addressed both concerns. We cannot ignore the fact that about 25 per cent of our population is made up of immigrants."

She created a program committee, she said, that included executive directors and board members from Jewish agencies in Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, and Ottawa.

"I put a proposal together about enhancing volunteerism in the immigrant community, and I was put in touch with Genesis. Agencies in Ottawa, Calgary and Vancouver were able to identify local donors, and they felt they had the capacity to take on the project."

Voihanski said JIAS hired Ronda Stoller Wunsch as national project co-ordinator, and found three local co-ordinators who recruit people for the program. There are now about 40 participants.

Wunsch said that agency leaders will speak at the sessions so participants will get some idea of where they'd like to intern. "In Calgary, one participant connected with the Jewish Historical Society and has begun writing stories about her immigrant experience."

The agency has received good feedback after the initial sessions, she said. "Both sides are learning about each other, and the immigrants feel welcomed."

Voihanski said her plan is to expand the project nationally, and eventually to other countries. "We're very excited about the way the project has taken off, and we know that the issues are the same everywhere."

Canadian group sends guide dogs to Israel

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

With his soft yellow-brown fur, caring brown eyes and puppy spunk, Morris is a genuine cutie on looks alone.

But this yellow lab, who is only a few months old, will soon be offering a lot more than looks. He is being groomed to leave Canada and make aliyah, so that he can be a guide dog for a visually impaired person in Israel.

Donated by the Canadian Guide Dogs for the Blind, little Morris was generously provided to the Canadian Friends of the Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind.

"Guide dogs give blind people a sense of liberty, independence and dignity," says Sara Gabriel, the Toronto-based director of development for the Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind, which helps blind people in Israel achieve independence and mobility through the use of guide dogs.

"Guide dogs give these people a second pair of eyes, which is so important for them, because it means they can go to work, school and even run, without relying on others."

Preparing the dogs for a recipient is an involved process.

The pups typically stay at the centre for the first two months and are then placed with foster parents for about a year.

A supervisor from the centre is actively involved in raising the puppy, with the goal of creating an environment where the puppies become used to living with a family, and are exposed to a variety of situations that are amenable to guide dog training.

Then for five months, the dogs are trained in residential and urban settings, learning such skills as stopping at curbs, avoiding barriers and travelling obediently and quietly on buses.

Finally, they are matched with blind people, based on temperament, size and strength.

The person who takes the dog then goes through a comprehensives course.

Morris has been living at the foster home of Missy Mandel in Toronto, who, together with her husband and two kids, already has two dogs in her house.

"Morris is quite a munchkin," Mandel says. "He's a lovely, smart little guy, but it has been a huge challenge for us. But I know what we're doing is a real mitzvah – he will hopefully give someone else a chance for not only having a companion, but having a better life."

The Canadian branch of the centre was started four years ago by Morris Samson, a renowned veterinarian for whom Morris is named.

"Morris Samson was instrumental in bringing the Israel Guide Dog Center to Canada," Gabriel says. "He does this as a volunteer, which is a big commitment."

Most funds for the centre are garnered through donations and Gabriel notes that as the demand for this service grows, the need for more funds also becomes more pressing.

"We have a waiting list of people in need of guide dogs, which is part of the reason we have support centres in Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom," she says.

"We don't have enough puppies and we also need a bigger facility, so we really do need to raise more funds to help many visually impaired people."

To learn more about the centre, visit www.israelguidedog.org or contact Sara Gabriel at 416-577-3600.

Durban again

It was not likely a coincidence that organizers scheduled the followup to the 2001 United Nations anti-racism conference – known as Durban II – to begin on the eve of Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah (Holocaust Remembrance Day). The four-day event convenes April 20 in Geneva. Iran, the country whose theocratic rulers, are the world's highest profile Holocaust deniers, is an executive member of the UN Human Rights Council, the body charged with implementing the declaration and the protocols from the 2001 conference in Durban, South Africa.

Sharing the planning and the organizational burdens of the conference with Iran – indeed one can say adding more human rights piquancy to the process – are the governments of Libya, which has been the chair of the conference's preparatory committee, and Cuba, which is the committee's official rapporteur.

The UN high commissioner for human rights, Navanethem Pillay, will preside over the conference. Pillay and Jessica Neuwirth, the director of the high commissioner's New York, office have promised that "the Durban II conference will not be a hate-fest. Rather, it will be a celebration of tolerance."

We doubt it. Pillay's and Neuwirth's optimism, though sincere, is simply not warranted.

Tolerance is simply not part of the outlooks of Iran, Libya and Cuba on the broad diversity of human life on this planet. In fact, the very idea is oxymoronic alongside the names of those countries.

A more likely outcome of the various discussions and debates in Geneva will be a roiling mess of cultivated calumny against Israel. The draft statements that form the basis of the agenda in Geneva have imported the entirety of the vituperative inventory of anti-Israel decisions that were adopted at Durban I. Those decisions explicitly condemn Israel as the brutish victimizer of the lowly Palestinians.

The charged atmosphere inside the conference room will likely spill onto the streets of Geneva. Pro-Israel advocates intend to be there to face down – as much as they can and as volubly as they can – the anti-Israel hysterics and histrionics.

But as many observers have also pointed out, Israel may not be the only subject to be pilloried in Geneva.

Sparks and various electrical charges may sizzle in the thick air of the conference hall on account of an attempt by the Arab-Muslim bloc of nations to warn westerners away from criticism of religion (read: Islam). In light of the experience of the government of Denmark four years ago regarding cartoons of the Muslim prophet Muhammad, the members of the European Union will not willingly accede to the Arab-Muslim bloc's preferences.

On the evening of April 20, the Jews of Geneva will host a special Holocaust remembrance service. When we, too, light our memorial candles that night, let us resolve to join them in our hearts to defend staunchly the truth of our history and the right of the sovereign Jewish state to have a place among all other nations of the earth.

Israeli electoral system

The article "Israel Must Address Flawed Electoral System" (CJN, March 19) raises some very important issues. It is clear from the results of the last election that Israeli popular opinion is very much divided. All of this leads to much instability and often regrettable compromises. The report prepared by Prof. Menachem Magidor of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem came up with some sensible solutions. It was recommended that regional elections be held to elect half of the Knesset's members, so that 50 per cent of the Knesset members will form a stronger tie between representatives and voters. The other 50 per cent would still be determined by the usual party slate, but instead of a two per cent threshold, there would be a five per cent requirement to attain any seats. As a result, many of the fringe parties would be eliminated and not have a disproportionate voice in the Knesset. Unfortunately, it would take bold leadership and co-operation among the four leading parties to achieve reform, but in these troubled times facing Israel, stability is an important requirement. The recommended reforms would eliminate the current situation, in which the governing party is under the constant threat of being defeated, causing and resulting in new elections. To avoid new elections, compromises are made that are not always in the best interest of the Israeli people.

Jerusalem school goes 'green'

Considering the extensive attention to the April 8 once-in-28-years Blessing of the Sun, your readers will be interested to learn that Boys Town Jerusalem seized this historic moment to launch a campaign to transform its entire 18-acre campus to solar power. Once completed, Boys Town will be the first school in Jerusalem to exclusively utilize clean energy.

Boys Town's going "green" will be reinforced by a special "green" curriculum component that will stress Torah, talmudic and rabbinic literature sources for appreciating and protecting the environment.

Since its founding in 1948, Boys Town Jerusalem has pursued its mission of turning young boys from limited backgrounds into young men with limitless futures. From junior high through the college level, the three-part curriculum at Boys Town – academic, technological and Torah – is designed to turn otherwise disadvantaged Israeli youth into productive citizens of tomorrow. More than 6,200 graduates hold key positions throughout Israeli society.

Henny (Hinderika) Zilverberg is the daughter of Jacob Zilverberg and Martha Polak. Henny was hidden during World War II by Mr. and Mrs. Rekker in Kollumerzwaag, The Netherlands. Both of them passed away years ago. On behalf of their son, I am trying to trace Henny. We know that she married Peter, who came from South Africa. She did send us a letter and a picture then. We still have these documents but the envelope with the address have gone. We heard that at one time she lived in Montreal. Please contact me if you have any information and I will pass it on to the Rekkers' son in The Netherlands.

Seeking adoptees' stories

I am writing a book of personal adoption stories tentatively called Who Am I, Really? and am looking for people who are willing to tell me their stories for inclusion in the book. Basically, I want only adult adoptees. They can be people who feel happy, complete and self-confident in their identities and feel no need to search for their birth families; or, they can be people who – whether happy or not – have felt the need to search for their biological roots. These stories may have ended in either a happy reunion, an unhappy reunion or no reunion at all. If you or someone you know have a story to tell and would like to be involved in my project, I would love to hear from you. Please contact me at dkoven@rogers.com.

Reflections on Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah

An escape through films: the true story of Berthe Cygelfarb and Lilly Borenstein

By ROXANA OLIVERA

Movie tickets in hand, Berthe Cygelfarb and Lilly Borenstein recently stood in line in front of the Royal Cinema in Toronto to catch the 12th edition of Cinéfranco, Toronto's international francophone film festival. The two widows meet every week, in fact, to share their passion for films.

As Jewish children in Paris during World War II, however, Cygelfarb and Borenstein were not likely to be found standing in line waiting for a movie. Rather, they sneaked into Cinéma Magie at the corner of Charrone Street and Trousseau Street by slipping in through the rear exit, and then neatly blending into the crowd. Back then, they did not know each other and neither was aware of the other's presence at the movie theatre.

It was only here in Canada that Cygelfarb and Borenstein met for the first time when the two attended a gathering of hidden children. Over the years, Cygelfarb says with great laughter, "we discovered that we had been neighbours and that we had been sneaking into the same cinema through the same exit door to see the same movies!"

They were both poor children of Jewish refugees. Born in Paris in July 1931, Cygelfarb was the daughter of a Polish tailor and a Polish seamstress. Her mother, Channa, would make Berthe and her brother go outside to play whenever she and her husband, Israel, needed access to the dining room table to do their work. Berthe and her younger brother Albert readily obliged. They joined other kids from the street to play hop-scotch. But if it was a Thursday afternoon, Berthe would then forego hop-scotch and dash to the nearby Cinéma Magie. There, she would lose herself in the fantasy of hit movies featuring Charlie Chaplin or Shirley Temple.

> 'We discovered that we had been neighbours and that we had been sneaking into the same cinema through the same exit door to see the same movies!'

Like many refugee Jews of this era, Cygelfarb's father was caught off guard in the first of three mass round-ups in 1941. On May 14, he was summoned to appear at a sports facility (called Japy) purportedly to regularize his legal status in France. There were 6,494 Jews summoned that day, but as many as 3,000 did not show up.

For his part, Cygelfarb's father believed that by going there, he would finally be able to get his papers in order. From Japy, he was then taken to Pithiviers, one of two camps located in Loiret. (The other camp was Beaune-la-Rolande.) "No one foresaw any danger at all," says Cygelfarb. "Initially, we were even allowed to visit him. So, I thought my father would come back."

Only a few days before her father was deported to Auschwitz in June of 1942, Cygelfarb and her mother travelled to Pithiviers to pay him a visit. "My mother stayed at the railway station and sent me to the camp alone," Cygelfarb recalls.

There, she spoke to the man in charge. "I think he took pity on me," she says. "I was only a child. So he called my father and my father spoke to me."

That was the last time Cygelfarb saw him. "He asked me to look after my mother and brother."

By July of 1942, rumours started to circulate around Paris that Jewish women and children were slated for deportation.

> By July of 1942, rumours started to circulate around Paris that Jewish women and children were slated for deportation

Cygelfarb's mother wasted no time looking for a place to hide. In the very early hours of July 16, 1942, she and a neighbour, along with their respective children, took refuge in their building's attic. While in hiding, they heard women and children cry as French police officers barged into their homes. Cygelfarb's little brother got a glimpse of their building superintendent pointing out windows for the officers. At nightfall, they abandoned their hiding place. Cygelfarb's mother tore the yellow stars from her children's clothes and together they took to the streets of Paris in search of a new shelter.

With the aid of underground Jewish organizations, Cygelfarb and her brother found safety staying with French Catholic families until war's end. Then the children were reunited with their mother. Soon afterward, Cygelfarb's hunt for her missing father began. She had a spark of hope that she would find her father alive, even though she knew chances were not good.

In Paris several years later, Cygelfarb learned of her father's deportation to Auschwitz. Not until decades later did she finally obtain written confirmation of his death.

Holding a telegram in her hands, Cygelfarb reads to me the last orders that sealed her father's fate. In it, none other than Adolf Eichmann himself orders the evacuation of the Pithiviers and Beaune-la-Rolande camps and for the immediate transfer of the Jews of France to Auschwitz.

In a further effort to establish absolute proof of her father's murder, Cygelfarb managed to obtain a death certificate that was issued on July 28, 1942, by a certain Dr. Meyer.

Borenstein is more reticent to bring up painful details of the past. On July 16, 1942, in one of the most brutal deportations in the history of France, Borenstein, her mother and five-year-old sister were rounded up by the French police and placed in the Vélodrome d'Hiver stadium. At some point, Borenstein and her sister were separated from their mother, and a French police officer inexplicably set them free. Along with 12,883 Parisian Jews, Borenstein's mother, Anna Tepicht, was then loaded aboard a cattle car and sent to Drancy en route to Auschwitz. Borenstein never saw her mother again.

In Cygelfarb's Toronto home, old photographs of her parents and of her husband's family decorate her bedroom wall and living room shelves. Her yellow star hangs on another wall. Books and films on the Holocaust fill a display case in one of the rooms.

"I have seen every movie that has been made about the Holocaust," she tells me, "as if I need to punish myself for having survived."

Not that long ago, Cygelfarb learned, in a further coincidence, that her father and Borenstein's father, Bernard Tepicht, had been placed on the same convoy to Auschwitz.

"Perhaps our parents were friends at some point," Cygelfarb says. "That we will never know, but all I know is that Lilly and I will remain close friends for the rest of our lives. And we will continue to go to the movies as much as we can."

But, of course, they will only seek admission through the front door.

Opinions

Why I love Israel

Though passionately committed to Israel, I'm often critical of its government, including the new one. Here's an attempt to explain how I reconcile my love for the Jewish state with my misgivings about those who run it.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

• In Israel I feel engaged in its future and free to express critical opinions because I care deeply. As I belong to it, so it belongs to me and to every Jew who shares in its destiny. That's why, as a Reform Jew, I'm determined to oppose those who, in the guise of piety and fidelity, want to keep me out.

• In Israel, I live Judaism not only in my home and in the synagogue, but in the street and in almost everything I do, good and bad.

• I'm overwhelmed by the ingenuity that has created this modern state. Israel celebrates the human spirit at its best, but, alas, at times also at its worst. Yet all of it is real and open to the scrutiny of Jewish teachings and Jewish history.

• Without Israel, I'd have to choose between assimilation and the ghetto and thus be either a parvenu or a pariah. But I believe that to justify every political and military action by Israel, Diaspora-style, only harms it. Loving a country mustn't inhibit us from criticizing it.

• In Israel, Judaism is bound up with its future. In view of what we've been through as a people and considering our situation in today's world, without Israel, Jews would soon become a quaint curiosity and Judaism a museum item.

• In Israel, where I live without fear of both assimilation and ghettoization, I'm better able to be open to the concerns of others. Neither parvenu nor pariah, I see myself as a full partner in the ways of the world. Here particularism and universalism strengthen each other.

• In Israel, I experience Zionism as the liberation movement of the Jewish people. This prompts me to champion the liberation of all peoples, including the Palestinians. I hope that, instead of seeing Zionism as the oppressive and imperialist enemy, Palestinians will come to view Israel as an opportunity that their Arab and Muslim brothers have denied them.

• In Israel there are many unforgettable places, but for me Jerusalem is special, both in its physical beauty and in its link to the past. Here heaven and earth do indeed meet.

• In Israel, my wife and I have five of the 10 members of the immediate family with which we've been blessed.

• In the words of Amos Oz, the famous Israeli writer: I love Israel even when I can't stand it.

A message of unity

Amid all the Jewish animosity on campus, the Ottawa chapter of Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPi), a fraternity with all Jewish members, recently held an honorary induction into the fraternity of two men – former federal cabinet minister Herb Gray and Michael Mostyn.

Justin Dahan in Ottawa

Herb Gray was Canada's first Jewish cabinet minister. He currently serves as the 10th chancellor of Carleton University, and is a companion of the Order of Canada.

Michael Mostyn, a graduate of the University of Western Ontario, is the public affairs director of B'nai Brith Canada. In his position, he deals with the issues that arise on campuses where Israeli Apartheid Week is held. He also speaks to and networks with many Jewish communal leaders.

Members of the current Ottawa chapter and alumni from Ottawa and Toronto were involved in the initiation of these two men into the AEPi brotherhood. One notable participant was Moishe Smith, a fraternity member who works with B'nai Brith International and has close ties to both Gray and Mostyn. Expressing pleasure at being part of the initiation process, he helped welcome the two new members into AEPi's ranks.

AEPi president Jon Telch, who is graduating this year with a major in sociology, spoke at the event. "In Alpha Epsilon Pi, we strive to be the best across all our chapters, ranging from North America to Israel. Fraternities across the world are falsely portrayed in the media and movies. An event like this summarizes our political affiliations and illustrates the powerful men who have come from the same background as we do. We lead our brothers by demanding something special. Events like this prove we are the best of the best, and we hope to continue to strengthen our brotherhood by honouring more esteemed Canadian Jewish leaders like the Right Honorable Herb Gray and Michael Mostyn."

After the initiation, with the guests of honour still present, AEPi joined with Omega Psi Phi, an African-American fraternity, to present a program on "Diversity in Brotherhood," whose purpose was to strengthen ties between the Jewish and African-American community. Leaders from both fraternities spoke out against racism and about achieving unity.

Following these speeches, Mostyn, Smith and Gray shared a few words with the crowd.

These powerful men talked about the importance of achieving a safe university campus, and they regaled those in attendance with political stories about their past and present.

But the speech that caused the audience at Carleton to rise in a standing ovation was given by Herb Gray.

Among other topics, Gray spoke flatteringly of fraternity life, saying: "A goal of [your] fraternity is to help each student to develop character, to learn responsibility and to develop a proper set of values through living together in brotherhood. Alpha Epsilon Pi prepares young men for their role as responsible citizens."

Gray also gave a kind of history lesson, talking about Jewish involvement in the U.S. Civil Rights movement in the 1960s.

"I suggest that Passover, our festival of freedom, links our history with that of black Canadians and Americans," Gray said. "We and they not only faced slavery but also centuries of oppression, discrimination and racism."

All three guests of honour spoke eloquently and shared a message – a message of unity. It is this unity that we as Jews should seek, not only among ourselves, but also with allies who have shared similar injustices. This is the only way we can combat these injustices and ensure our past is never forgotten and never repeated.

In defence of the Wicked Son

Is the Wicked Son really so bad? "What is the meaning of this service to you," he asks. By emphasizing "to you," the Haggadah tells us he sets himself apart from the Jewish People and forfeits his place among those saved in Egypt.

Jesse Mintz in Halifax

Now, admittedly, there are many ways to understand the parable of the Four Sons – as analogous to characteristics within each individual that must be properly cultivated and controlled; as archetypes of students and models for how best to teach them; and as corresponding to the generations of Jews removed from a traditional setting and struggling with their identity.

And yet, in each understanding, the Wicked Son is vilified. Even his name – Wicked – juxtaposes heavily with the other sons' names that denote not a state of character, but a level of awareness and intelligence.

This article, my last one, is my farewell to The CJN. I have written here for nearly two years and would like to thank everyone for reading, even if you didn't necessarily agree.

And, in typical fashion, I'd like to do so by way of a polemic – I am the Wicked Son.

Shocking, I know. Those of you who know me will surely disagree. "Not a chance," you say. "You went to Bialik and CHAT [Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto], participated in the March of the Living and Birthright Israel, you can't be the fabled Wicked Son of the seder." (Note: if I had said I was the Simple Son, none of you would have batted an eye).

Rest assured, it's true.

But I'd like to defend the Wicked Son. I don't think he – nor I for that matter – deserves the bum rap he's been getting. After all, what does he really say that's so invective?

"What does this mean to you?" I've been struggling with a question very similar to that myself. Despite the idiom of walking a mile in another man's shoes, we can only understand the world around us through our own eyes. My experiences colour every thought I have as much as my education and morals guide me.

When I go to shul, I ask, "What does this mean to you?" When I sit around the Sabbath table, I ask, "What does this mean to you?" And when I participate in the seder, I invariably ask, "What does this mean to you?" I ask these questions not out of contempt or disdain but out of the curiosity of a student wanting to learn.

The rituals of Judaism have, as their basis, a core set of beliefs – primary among them is the belief in a personal God, the God who led the Jews out of Egypt. So when I sit around the table, without personally relating to the rituals performed around me, I very intentionally ask what it means to others, who undoubtedly have a different set of beliefs underpinning their actions, to better understand their mentality.

The Wicked Son is only the son removed from the paradigm of those around him. He is only the son trying to understand a Jewish world as he sees it without the Jewish subtext. He is every Jew who sees the seder night as a repository of Jewish culture and heritage, and tries to work out what ritual means without belief.

After all, he is at the table, isn't he? He is asking questions. He is interested.

Despite the coolness with which the so-called Wicked Son poses his question, he cannot be faulted for being set apart. The ritual he sees around him, having been performed for countless generations, does not have the same meaning for him as it did for his grandparents and theirs before them. And, in response to that, he asks questions.

And that is all I have tried to do in my tenure at The CJN – ask questions. I hope you have learned as much from this process as I have. Thank you for reading.

The Kirshner File

A sampler from the Jewish Film Festival

This year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, a major event in Toronto's cultural scene, runs until April 26. Happily, it has something for everyone. Here is an enticing sampler of morsels from its delectable program.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israel's former prime minister, Ariel Sharon, lies in a coma today, three years after suffering a massive stroke. Sharon, who was at the apex of his powers when he was suddenly felled, is the subject of Dror Moreh's tightly focused biopic, Sharon (Thursday, April 23 at 1 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema).

Concentrating on his career as prime minister from 2001 onward, this 90-minute film focuses both on the political and personal dimensions of his life. Moreh portrays him as an avuncular figure rather than as a bull in a china shop, the image he was usually saddled with in the media.

The godfather of the settlement expansion movement in the territories and the architect of the 1982 war in Lebanon, Sharon was considered all washed up due to his role in the accompanying Sabra and Shatila massacre in Beirut. Indeed, he was forced to resign as Menachem Begin's defence minister once the details of that event reached the public.

Back then, Sharon – a former general – was a great believer in military power, Moreh suggests. But after defeating Ehud Barak in an election, he tempered his views and came to appreciate the virtues of restraint in the face of provocation. In the wake of a horrific suicide bombing in Tel Aviv shortly after his electoral triumph, he did not, as widely expected, lash out at the Palestinians, Moreh points out. But he did order the reoccupation of the West Bank, in Operation Defensive Shield, after 29 Israelis were killed by a bomber at the Park Hotel in Netanya in 2002.

Sharon's decision to pull out of the Gaza Strip unilaterally, a topic Moreh explores at length, stemmed from his new-found belief that the occupation was unsustainable. His hatred of Yasser Arafat, the president of the Palestinian Authority, ran deep, particularly after the eruption of the second intifadah. But in deference to the United States, Sharon did not target him for assassination.

The film, augmented by archival footage and interviews with his aides, foreign officials and Israeli contemporaries, depicts him as a lonely, sentimental man who never quite got over the death of his beloved wife, Lily, whom he referred to as "a very special girl."

In unpeeling the layers of his personality, Moreh films Sharon in various locales. He inspects a mangled bus in Jerusalem following a suicide attack. He confers with his assistants. He adjusts a microphone at a rally. He meets George W. Bush at the White House. He comments on a sunset at his ranch in the Negev and gazes longingly at old photographs of himself. He encourages settlers in Gaza. He wanders through an art gallery.

In short, Sharon is a portrait of a canny politician at the top of his game.

Richard Rodgers (1902-1979), the illustrious American composer, had few peers. Not counting such iconic figures as Irving Berlin, Cole Porter and George Gershwin, he was in a class by himself.

Teamed up with lyricists Lorenz Hart and Oscar Hammerstein II, he wrote "stick in your ear tunes."

Roger Sherman's superbly entertaining film, Richard Rodgers: The Sweetest Sounds (Sunday, April 19 at 3:30 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema), is an ode to a genius and a model documentary.

When you think of his memorable songs, your heads spins in admiration. He gave us Isn't It Romantic?, Blue Moon, Oh, What A Beautiful Mornin', If I Loved You, You'll Never Walk Alone, It Might As Well be Spring, Some Enchanted Evening, Getting to Know You, My Favorite Things, The Sound of Music, Climb Ev'ry Mountain, My Funny Valentine, The Lady Is A Tramp, Bewitched, Bothered And Bewildered and Do-Re-Mi. These songs, from such Broadway hits as I Married An Angel, Pal Joey, Carousel, South Pacific, Oklahoma!, The Sound of Music and The King And I, left a lasting legacy.

Beyond exploring his captivating musical contributions, Sherman's biopic delves into his life and partnership with Hart and Hammerstein. The son of a New York physician who changed the family name from Abrahams to Rodgers, he was a prodigy who met Hart when he was only 17.

Although Hart was an alcoholic whose work habits left much to be desired, Rodgers was devoted to him. Rodgers, his disciplined approach notwithstanding, was a difficult and neurotic man given to depression. And as Sherman discloses in the tail-end of this 117-minute film, he, too, drank too much.

Perhaps it was the pressure he was under. From 1935 to the early 1940s, he and Hart had nine consecutive hits on Broadway, from Jumbo and Babe In Arms to The Boys From Syracuse and By Jupiter. Critics, of course, expected more of the same. But by 1941, Rodgers had to turn to Hammerstein, given Hart's unreliability. Hammerstein, a workaholic whose last success was Show Boat in 1927, hit it off beautifully with Rodgers. Their first show, Oklahoma!, was a sensation.

Ariel Sharon visits an art gallery in Israel.

Within a few years, Rodgers and Hammerstein were an American institution. They had 18 years together, earning 35 Tony Awards, 15 Academy Awards and two Pulitzer Prizes. With Hammerstein's untimely death at 65, Rodgers' best days were behind him. As Sherman observes, their plays are still going strong.

Rodgers' contemporary, Harold Arlen (1905-1986), is profiled in Don McGlynn's documentary, Somewhere Over the Rainbow: Harold Arlen (Thursday, April 23 at 2:15 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre).

Like Rodgers, he was an original. His songs were fresh and imaginative and ranged from Stormy Weather and That Old Black Magic to Let's Fall In Love and Blues In The Night.

Born in Buffalo, N.Y., the son of a cantor, Arlen's real name was Hyman Arlook. An accomplished pianist and vocalist, his collaborators were Ted Koehler, with whom he wrote his first well-known song, Get Happy, and Johnny Mercer, with whom he wrote Over the Rainbow, which the Recording Industry Association of America rated as the 20th century's number 1 song.

In this thoroughly enjoyable film, Arlen plays the piano, sings and reminisces, while two of his colleagues, Koehler and Mercer, recall his prodigal talents. Better still, some of the finest vocalists of his time, including Frank Sinatra, Bing Crosby, Tony Bennett, Lena Horne, Barbra Streisand and Mel Torme, belt out his inestimable songs.

If you're looking for a complete change of pace and atmosphere, try The Debt (Saturday, April 25 at 7 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema). Starring the Israeli actress Gila Almagor, Asaf Bernstein's thriller is set in Israel and Europe and turns on a manhunt, conducted by three Mossad agents, for a Nazi war criminal, the Surgeon of Birkenau.

Composed of flashbacks, and unfolding in Hebrew, German and Russian, the picture is taut and suspenseful, a fine example of its genre. Almagor, a veteran of the Israeli stage and screen, delivers a competent performance, but she's really miscast here.

Gruber's Journey (Thursday, April 23 at 9:30 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre), ably directed by Radu Gabrea, also deals with the Holocaust. An Italian journalist embedded with the German army in Romania arrives in the city of Iasi in 1941 shortly after a pogrom. Plagued by breathing problems, he seeks out the services of an allergist, a doctor who happens to be Jewish. But as he conducts his search for this elusive specialist, he discovers the awful truth about Iasi. This is a jolting journey into the bowels of hell.

An investment that appeals to skeptics.

JNF shaliach joins Israeli-Palestinian dialogue

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The North America Muslim Foundation held a discussion late last month at at the NAMF Centre mosque in Scarborough about the recent war in Gaza and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Yaen Vered

Yaen Vered, a shaliach for the Jewish National Fund who works for the Israeli Antiquities Authority, and Hicham Safieddine, a PhD student in Middle Eastern studies at the University of Toronto, each presented their opinions about the conflict to an audience of about 50 people.

Vered began his address by saying that when people talk about Palestinians who fled or were expelled from their homes after Israel's War in Independence in 1948, people forget that 600,000 Jews were thrown out of their homes in Iraq, Syria, Egypt, Yemen, and other Arab countries.

He said these Jews, who were forced to leave behind assets worth billions of dollars, were absorbed into the Israeli Jewish community.

"We absorbed them and we went into a very serious time of rationing… We split whatever we had with our brethren," Vered said. "We built a country of refugees. There were 650,000 Jews in 1948 in the Land of Israel. In two years, we quadrupled that number."

Vered said that when Israel's independence was declared, "Israel was attacked… It is a fact that some of the Arab countries were promising the Palestinians that if they got out of the cities that the Jews were living in, [they would] get everything back," he said.

"When you begin a war… when you lose, you lose. When you win, you win… We took over parts of the country. [Arabs] took over parts of the country."

Vered questioned why the leaders of the Arab countries didn't help Palestinian refugees recover from the war.

"Why did they not take the initiative to come to help to absorb and help those poor people, the people who were expelled from their homes… to revitalize their lives?… Because they are used as a political cow and those people suffered all those years to remain political cows against the state of Israel."

Safieddine prefaced his address by asking the gathering not to fear to speak out for the Palestinian cause and to consider that there is a distinction between anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism.

"Every time we try to speak about the conflict, what happens is people who are aware that this might actually underline what is happening jump up and say anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism is the same, and they try to suppress you," Safieddine said.

"The two types of people who are uncomfortable with [the distinction]… are the Zionists, because they want to suppress the criticism of Israel, and the others are anti-Semites who want to use criticism of Israel largely to criticize Jews."

Speaking about the three-week war in Gaza this past winter that killed an estimated 1,300 Palestinians and 13 Israelis, Safieddine said that there is "no doubt that there were war crimes committed by the Israelis."

He added that "90 per cent of the time," Israelis break the ceasefires between the two sides and that "every time there is organized political resistance by Palestinians, the Israeli government tries to destroy it."

But Vered said that Hamas and its supporters were launching rockets aimed at civilian populations.

"There is no government in the world that would stand aside and not go into war in that case," he said.

When it comes to alleged war crimes, Vered said that Israeli pilots and soldiers are instructed not to target civilians.

"Unfortunately, when you take children and civilians as human shields, there is no question that some of them are going to get hit with shrapnel. You can't help it."

He added that he is sorry for the loss of life on the Palestinian side, but said that the discrepancy in the number of casualties has to do with the fact that the Israeli government invests in shelters and infrastructure to protects its citizens and soldiers from rockets and mortars.

Vered said the war in Gaza wouldn't have happened if Hamas put an end to the constant rockets aimed at Israel.

"Look how they live in Ramallah, how they live in Nablus, how they live in other parts of the West Bank. It's a really nice place to live. Why can't we do it in Gaza? Why should we and the Gazans be faced with such atrocities?"

Safieddine said he believes in a one-state solution and that what is now Israel should revert back to the way it was before 1948.

Vered said the concept of one state for two nations doesn't work anywhere else in the world.

Safieddine countered by saying that it did work in Palestine before 1948.

But Vered, said that before Israel declared independence, there were wars, riots and uprisings against Jews in 1917, 1921, 1929, and between 1936 and 1939. "So to say that everything was quiet and serene and so on is unfortunately not true."

He added that most Israelis support a two-state solution because "no Israeli would like to be in a position that the Hamas government would put them in.

"Hamas has enforced on the Gaza Strip a sharia law [Islamic religious law] and they are cutting off hands. They are killing their own people. There was a wedding of a Fatah person in Gaza… [Hamas] came in and shot 20 people. I don't want to live in such a place," he said.

Safieddine said Vered's anecdotes are exceptions and only promote the idea that Palestinians are "backwards" and "evil."

When asked by a moderator if the renunciation of armed resistance would help the Palestinian cause, Safieddine said that armed resistance is sanctioned by international law.

"If you are fighting an occupation, you have the right to use armed resistance, as long as you abide by the rules of the law… [it] is their right."

Vered, who was asked about the treatment of Palestinian prisoners in Israeli jails, said there are thousands of terrorists in Israeli prisons, some of whom "were caught with blood on their hands.

"They have visitation rights from their families, they have the right to study, they have the right to get phone calls… They have meetings in jail to have political discussions, and so on," he said.

"[Israel] has one prisoner with Hamas. And you know what they say. He will not see the light of day… That soldier [Gilad Schalit] was kidnapped. That soldier is not getting anything…" he said, adding that he has not been seen by the Red Cross and only receives and sends one letter a year to and from his family.

Safieddine said that Schalit was captured as a prisoner of war and has rights as a prisoner of war.

Policies of Netanyahu's new government unclear

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Israel's new foreign minister Avigdor Lieberman's announcement that the Jewish state would not be bound by the 2007 Annapolis "shelf" agreement was criticized by much of the international media. Lost among the condemnation was Lieberman's declaration that Israel would adhere to the 2002 "road map" peace plan sponsored by the Quartet (consisting of the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia).

Since the road map calls for the creation of a Palestinian state as its final stage – whereas Annapolis was an effort to negotiate, without prior stages, a final status agreement – Lieberman, in effect, admitted (as some Israeli analysts pointed out) that Israel is still committed to a two-state solution.

The Economist magazine, which is often critical of Israel, did bring some nuance to its analysis of Israel's new government. In the April 2 editorial, "Change your tune," it wrote that "the politics of the ill-named peace process are invariably fluid. For one thing, Mr. Netanyahu is notoriously opportunistic, a quality that can sometimes be turned to a common good. He talks, albeit vaguely, of his desire to make peace with his neighbours, presumably including Palestinians… Previous Israeli leaders, including Mr. Netanyahu's predecessors, Ehud Olmert and Ariel Sharon, both once set their faces against Palestinian statehood but were persuaded that it was the only way to make Israel safe. It is possible that Mr. Netanyahu will in due course come to see similar sense."

Indeed, a number of analysts caution against drawing hasty conclusions about how the Netanyahu government will act. In "Netanyahu government reconsidering road map" (Jerusalem Post, April 6) Herb Keinon made three key points:

• The Netanyahu government has undertaken a thorough policy review "in which all diplomatic components – from the road map peace plan to the Annapolis process – are being re-evaluated," and so it would be wrong to prejudge precisely where the government stands;

• Regarding Lieberman's remarks about Annapolis, a senior Israeli official "said that until the government adopted a policy, the comments of various ministers reflected their own positions, but not government's."

• While a specific set of policies is being worked out, in general, the government sees ending the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as one of its central objectives, but it does not want to begin with Israeli concessions, which in the past have led nowhere.

Key requirements include strong, reliable Palestinian institutions and an economy that can underscore and sustain a durable peace, along with a unified Palestinian government committed to accepting Israel as a Jewish state.

On this last, crucial point, the Economist wrote that Fatah and Hamas, although " bitterly opposed," are " groping" toward a unity government. Whether they even achieve remains very uncertain. However, the magazine is overly optimistic in believing that Hamas can be cajoled into "accepting previous Palestinian agreements with Israel that include recognition of the Jewish state without having clearly to spit out the dreaded words of acknowledgment itself."

Yet short of a unified Palestinian government that is willing to live alongside Israel as a Jewish state, all discussion of what any Israeli government can be expected to do to nurture a two-state solution remains moot. It's as important for the media to focus on this part of the equation as on the Israeli side.

In " Educating a generation of jihadists" (Toronto Star, April 6), columnist Rabbi Dow Marmur wrote about Arab-Israeli journalist Khaled Abu Toameh's dismay during a recent speaking tour of North American campuses, in which he encountered more blind, anti-Israel rhetoric than in the West Bank.

Rabbi Marmur quoted from an article for the Hudson Institute by Abu Toameh: "We should not be surprised if the next generation of jihadists comes not from the Gaza Strip or the mountains and mosques of Pakistan and Afghanistan, but from university campuses across the U.S… What's happening on the U.S. campuses is not about supporting Palestinians as much as it is about promoting hatred for the Jewish state."

Added Rabbi Marmur: "What masquerades as pro-Palestinian is just anti-Jewish… This is anti-Semitism in the guise of human rights advocacy."

Panel looks at Haifa's cultural, ethnic diversity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Cultural and ethnic diversity in and out of Israel was the topic of a panel discussion sponsored by the Haifa Foundation and the Canadian Friends of Haifa University.

The forum, which took place April 2 at Beth Tzedec Congregation, centred on the Israeli port city of Haifa, whose diverse population consists of Jews, Muslims, Christians, Druze, Baha'is and both Russian and Ethiopian new immigrants.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

The moderator, Beth Tzedec's spiritual leader, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, suggested that an increasingly globalized world forces people to meet the challenge of diversity.

Haifa, where Jews and Arabs live in close proximity, exemplifies diversity, he said. In this country, the challenge is about how Canadians can acknowledge and respect diversity.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said that Jewish tradition is steeped in the values of diversity.

Shai Razieli, a native of Haifa who now lives in Toronto, said that Haifa's ethnic pluralism predates the establishment of Israel.

Hassan Shukri, the Muslim mayor of Haifa during the British Mandate period, appointed a Jewish deputy, and this custom remains intact today.

"Coexistence is in our blood," Razieli said.

Faisal Azaiza, head of the Jewish-Arab Center at the University of Haifa and the head of the MA program at its school of social work, discussed bilingualism and bilingual education in Israel.

Azaiza, a Muslim, said that while most Israeli Arabs speak Hebrew, the majority of Israeli Jews don't speak Arabic, yet two-thirds of Israeli Jews surveyed believe that Arabic should be a mandatory subject in Israeli schools.

Judging by surveys, Israeli Jewish high school students generally don't think that Arabic will be of use to them in later life.

Their Arab counterparts, however, learn Hebrew for pragmatic economic reasons, Azaiza pointed out.

Israeli Jewish parents who send their children to bilingual Arabic-Hebrew schools do so to break down social barriers. Arab parents do so on the assumption that their children will be better off in Israeli society with a sound grasp of Hebrew.

Support for bilingual schools is higher among Arabs than Jews, he said.

Ken Greenberg, former director of urban design and architecture for the City of Toronto, said he was "very surprised" that most Israeli Jews don't speak Arabic.

As ethnically homogeneous cities become a thing of the past, people will have to learn to deal with this phenomenon, he noted.

Greenberg said that while Tel Aviv looks almost as diverse as Toronto in terms of its inhabitants, it's composed primarily of Jews and some foreign guest workers.

Siamak Hariri, a Baha'i architect based in Toronto, described Haifa as "a special city" by virtue of its status as world headquarters of the Baha'i movement.

Baha'i temples are open to all faiths and people from all walks of life, he said.

Karen Mock, president of the Canadian Friends of Haifa University and a senior policy adviser on diversity and equity to the Ontario minister of education, discussed the challenges of realizing the promises of diversity in a multicultural society.

Bone marrow testing drive planned at Adath Israel

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Jewish community has always responded enthusiastically when asked to come out to be tested as bone marrow donors.

We remember drives for Alison Atlas, Jay Feinberg, Audi Stanley – when people of all religious streams, all social groupings and all ages lined up patiently in the hopes of helping one of our own. Once again, the call is going out.

Jonathan Grossman, 46, is a self-described "software techie." In February, he was diagnosed with idiopathic myelofibrosis, a disease in which the bone marrow no longer produces red or white blood cells, or platelets. There is no treatment or cure, except for a bone marrow transplant.

A bone marrow testing drive, under the aegis of Canadian Blood Services and Gift of Life, takes place Sunday, April 26, from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. at Adath Israel Congregation. Eligible donors must be between the ages of 18 and 60, and in general good health. Unlike earlier drives, no blood is taken at the drive, only swabs from the inner cheeks.

Ideally, six matching genetic markers are necessary for a bone marrow donation to be successful. The best chance, then, is either from the patient's family, or, if there is no family match – as in Grossman's case – from someone who comes from the same general geographic area.

Grossman said that originally doctors felt that his gastro-intestinal symptoms were a sign of Crohn's disease, which several members of his family have. A long, frustrating course of blood tests at Toronto's Princess Margaret Hospital this past February confirmed that he has idiopathic myelofibrosis. Since then, he has had weekly blood transfusions to keep him alive.

"It was a shock," Grossman said. However, he said, his wife, Julie, and his family took it as "a call to arms. We were not blinded like a deer in the headlights – we were motivated to do something. That's what our family is like."

His daughter, Jessica, a student at the University of Western Ontario, has a Facebook group, to get information out to the public and to look for possible donors. He also has a younger son, Jason. Both children – and Grossman himself – are graduates of Bialik Hebrew Day School.

Julie Grossman, a clinical manager at Baycrest Hospital, has organized the bone marrow testing drive at Adath Israel. She said that she has arranged for six lead volunteers to manage the event, so that things will run smoothly.

For more information, call Julie Grossman, 416-932-8132, or visit the websites www.theoffice.com or www.giftoflife.org. Those tested in earlier drives do not have to be tested again.

גידי קורן וחברים

אני נוטע בכבוש החוף ושומע את הודעת ראש הממשלה, עם כניסתו לישיבה הראשונה של ממשלתו החדשה. הוא מדבר על האתגרים הכלכליים והביטחוניים שעומדים לפנינו, ואנינו שוכח גם את המצב החברתי הקשה. אלא שהרכבת ממשלתו החדשה מעוררת פליאות וספקות בעיני רבים:

"ואיך זה שיוסי בניון משתף בנבחרת כל כך חלש"-צוטקת מקהלת הבולבולים. כעבור פחות משבוע כובש בניון את שער הנצחון עבור ליברפול-ללמדך שכשיש לידו קבוצת שחקנים טובה כמותו-יוצא משחק צוות מצוין. אבל שישאר בינינו.

זה לכשעצמו אינו מעיד על בעיה, אלא שלפחות מנהל סניף אחד הרגה שהם אינם רוצים לעצבן את המוסלמים באזורם, ואינם מעוניינים להפוך את הביקוש של יינות ישראליים בפסח למלחמה.

זה מיצוין מאוד מזר לאור העובדה שמוסלים דתיים אינם טועמים יין בכלל.

אשמח לשמוע מכם אם נתקלתם בבעיות דומות באזורכם. זה סוג של אפליה שאם היא קיימת-תפקידנו לעצור אותה.

אבל שישאר בינינו.

Divorce guide informs Jewish women of rights

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish Women International Canada (JWIC), along with a committee of experts, has published a brochure about divorce for Jewish women.

The free brochure was made possible by Family Law Education for Women (FLEW), a public legal information project funded by the Ontario government whose goal is to inform Ontario women about their family law rights.

FLEW has produced materials on such topics as custody and access, child protection, domestic contracts, family law issues for immigrant, refugee and non-status women, and family law arbitration.

It's made up of representatives from a number of local groups, including YWCA Toronto, Metropolitan Toronto Action Committee on Violence Against Women and Children (METRAC), Community Legal Education Ontario (CLEO), the Canadian Council of Muslim Women (CCMW), Springtide Resources and the National Association of Women and the Law (NAWL).

Penny Krowitz, executive director of JWIC, said her organization got involved in the project about a year ago. "I was invited to a meeting, because FLEW decided to broaden its committee to include reference groups such as ours – the only Jewish group – who represent the demographics and experience of Ontario women."

Their idea was to publish materials on a wide variety of subjects pertinent to women.

"Our [mandate] was to outline a woman's legal and religious obligations when dissolving a marriage in a format that is simple to understand, relevant, accurate, and easily accessible."

Since February 2008, Krowitz has been meeting with her committee, which includes Evelyn Brook, a JWIC national executive board member and president of the Canadian Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get; Dr. Rachael Turkienicz of the Learning Centre; John Syrtash, family law lawyer; Judith Holzman, family law lawyer; Norma Joseph, a professor of religion at Concordia University and an expert on the get, the Jewish divorce document; Corinne Rusch-Drutz of YWCA Canada; Joanna Morrison, co-ordinator of community development services at JIAS Toronto, and Avraham Friedman, a former outreach worker at Jewish Family & Child.

As well as holding a number of planning meetings, the committee also met with local rabbis in the Orthodox community, including Rabbi Mordechai Ochs of Toronto's Orthodox Jewish divorce court, to get their input.

The committee researched what languages the brochure should be translated into – it's currently being translated into French, Hebrew and Russian – and held focus groups to get an objective and grassroots response to the material.

"The actual look of the material changed when we identified the need for a more reader-friendly style of presentation," Krowitz said.

In writing the brochure, she said, committee members had to keep in mind that they were writing for women from every background, "from secular to frum."

Information covered in the brochure includes the definition of a Jewish divorce, who needs one, and where to get it, as well as a list of community resources.

It also talks about the differences between Jewish and Canadian divorce law; who deals with custody, support and property division, and what happens when a husband refuses to give a get.

JWIC and FLEW plan to distribute the brochure to every centre across the province that has a connection to the Jewish community. For information, call FLEW at 416-961-8101, ext. 317, or JWIC at 416-630-9313.

Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit opposed

JTA

Palestinian officials have called on Canada to cancel a planned exhibit of the Dead Sea Scrolls.

The officials say the exhibit would violate international law.

In a letter to Prime Minister Stephen Harper and directors of the Royal Ontario Museum, Hamdan Taha, director general of the archeological department in the Palestinian ministry of tourism and antiquities, alleges the scrolls were acquired illegally by Israel when the Jewish state annexed east Jerusalem in 1967.

The Palestinians claim the six-month exhibit slated to begin in June violates at least four international conventions or protocols on the treatment of cultural goods that were "illegally" obtained, the Toronto Star reported last week.

"The exhibition would entail exhibiting or displaying artifacts removed from the Palestinian territories" by Israel, Taha wrote.

Pnina Shor, head of the artifacts treatment and conservation department at the Israel Antiquities Authority, which is organizing the exhibit jointly with the museum, told the Star that the complaint was unfounded.

"We are the custodians of the Dead Sea Scrolls," Shor said. "As such, we have a right to exhibit them and to conserve them."

William Thorsell, the museum's CEO, said he is "quite certain the scrolls fall within the parameters of the law."

A spokesperson for Foreign Affairs Minister Lawrence Cannon declined to comment.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Coalition unites disparate forces

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Politics make strange bedfellows. The recent Israeli coalition government is no exception.

Under the Law of Return, hundreds of thousands of non-Jews from the former Soviet Union have immigrated to Israel. These people have fully integrated themselves into Israeli society, attending Israeli schools, participating in Israeli youth groups, and serving in the Israel Defence Forces. On the surface they have become totally Israeli. The dissonance between Israeli identity and Jewish identity surfaces only when it comes to marriage.

The Israeli rabbinate, which controls all matter of personal status – such as marriage and divorce, and deciding who is a Jew – has refused to issue marriage licenses to them. This is understandable in a case of a Jew to a "non-halachic Jew" (someone who considers themselves Jewish by association or patrilineal descent, but doesn't meet the halachic criteria), but it's absurd when two non-halachic Jews want to marry each other. The only recourse for such couples has been a foreign marriage. Usually a quick getaway to Cyprus does the trick. After marrying abroad, a couple can "legally" return as husband and wife.

It was the demographic power of these people and their frustration with this absurdity that catapulted their party, Yisrael Beiteinu (Israel is our home) to the forefront of Israeli politics. Its leader, Avigdor Lieberman, understood this well, and joined the coalition conditional on some sort of resolution to this issue.

Chief Sephardi Rabbi Shlomo Amar had already released a position paper suggesting that some sort of civil union between two non-halachic Jews be allowed. He proposed that not only is there nothing wrong with this, but rather it would constitute a mitzvah, a fulfilment of one of the Seven Noachide Laws that concern themselves with God's expectations for the nations of the world. Couples as such would thereby fulfil the Divine Will. Rabbi Ovadia Yosef concurred and backed the initiative.

The daily Yated Neeman, the newspaper of the Lithuanian yeshiva establishment, decried this position in the most unambiguous fashion. "This is a dangerous initiative that is liable to introduce civil marriages to the Jewish people and cause a serious breech to the Jewish law," it said.

While it was clear to all that these arrows were directed at Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, the apparently politically correct fashion of Lithuanian rabbis is to attack the Shas party.

The in-house advertisement went on: "It is well known to all that the Halachah is unequivocal, and there is no room for serious breeches included in this dangerous initiative."

Similar sentiments, in more toned-down rhetoric, were expressed in the daily Hamodia, the voice of the chassidic Gerrer sect.

Until the government coalition talks began, both Rabbi Yosef Shalom Elyashiv of the Lithuanian stream and Rav Yaakov Aryeh Alter, rebbe of the Gerrer chassidim, opposed any form of civil union as a dangerous slippery slope. While everyone has the right to their opinion, and even to diametrically change that very opinion, one is left breathless at the scope and timing of these rabbis' subsequent change of heart.

In joining the coalition, United Torah Judaism (UTJ), the party that represents the Lithuanian yeshiva world, not only fully embraced the concept of civil union, its leaders signed an understanding wherein they will participate in a committee that will "explore and recommend ways of including halachically recognized Jews who wish to avail themselves of civil unions when a halachah will not permit a marriage, such as a kohen to a divorcee or a Jew to a non-halachic Jew."

But this was only the first point of contention and then compromise between UTJ and the governing coalition. Lieberman insisted that for these Israelis, the process of conversion should be eased. He proposed to accomplish this by giving the power of conversion to a greater number of rabbis (including local rabbis), something that had been proposed and endorsed by Shas. Predictably, this, too, was decried by the Lithuanian and chassidic rabbis prior to the coalition talks as a course leading to corruption, bribery and other such unacceptable pressures on the rabbis. Only on the morning before the new government was formed did Rabbi Elyashiv agree to this broadening of powers.

UTJ finally signed a last-minute agreement with the coalition government.

The Jewish Body, by Melvin Konner, Random House.

Facts and provocative speculation

The author of this singular and impressive work – a mélange of facts and provocative speculation – is one of America's most distinguished anthropologists and physicians. At Emory University, he instructs students both about human biology and Jewish culture and history.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The Jewish Body, ambitious and wide ranging, is a history of the rituals of Judaism from brit milah to burial and includes such diverse topics as sex, menstruation, Jewish physical awareness, tough Jewish mobsters, the elusive Jewish gene and how the creation of Israel has led to Jewish affirmations of renewal and survival.

The author relates that when he was growing up in Brooklyn in the 1950s, "non-Jewish boys would sometimes taunt us with the demand that we show them our horns, and they seemed to believe that the purpose of our yarmulkes was to conceal the stubs of the cut-off horns. Since the devil and some of his imps have horns, this belief confirmed their worst fears about the "Satanic" Jews and their insidious aims of corrupting good Christians and dominating the world.

Actually, Konner shows that it was all a mistake based on an early Christian mistranslation of a biblical text. The Torah says that when Moses descended from Mount Sinai with the Ten Commandments, "the skin of his face shone with rays." The Hebrew word "keran" means either "ray" or "horn." The translator chose "horn," which became the basis for Michelangelo's famous sculpture of the Horned Moses.

When the sex act is performed, affirmed the rabbis of old, with the wrong frame of mind, harm is done to the child that is born. They suggested the following: neither partner should be drunk, a man should not indulge in the act with his wife if he is intending to divorce her, a man must not be involved with nor have his mind on another woman. And finally, the sexual act must not result from a coarse or brazen overture, but from tenderness, respect and love.

The author laments the low Jewish birth rate and the inevitable decline in the Jewish population. In the United States for example, Jews are not replenishing their numbers. For every 100 Jewish deaths, there are 85 births.

The creation of the State of Israel has led to a new kind of Jew. After centuries in which Jews were hated because they were weak (and treated accordingly), they are hated today because they are strong. Strong is better. Or as former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir put it, "If we have to have a choice between being dead and pitied, and being alive with a bad image, we would rather be alive and have the bad image."

Konner, believes that the Nobel prizes, university presidencies, etc., will keep on coming, but that these achievements of the mind will be accompanied by a different concept of the Jewish body, one that has earned the Jews a new kind of respect in the world.

Iran looms as a threat to Israel's very existence. Is it possible that Iranian and nuclear bombs could kill millions of Israelis? Yes, asserts the author. "But then all of Iran's cities and towns will be turned to radioactive rubble, a terrible symmetry just like the one that prevented war between the United States and the Soviet Union for more than 40 years… physical strength can't always ultimately protect you, but it can make people afraid of you and that in itself is protection; so that where the respect can not be won by entreaty, it may be commanded, and where it can not be commanded, it may be enforced."

Verdict: stimulating and original, this relatively brief volume is a rewarding anatomical account of Jewish practice, history and culture.

Poverty beyond Passover

CLASS ACT
By Daniel Held

For many years I have volunteered for the Passover food drive. My mother used to send me to school with a box of matzah or a can of gefilte fish to donate, my sister would shlep me along on delivery day to help load and unload the car, and now I encourage my students to bring in donations and help with the delivery. Each year as I help in collecting food, packing boxes and delivering them, I develop a clearer picture of the acute needs of so many in our community.

With big-ticket fundraising dinners and speakers, state-of-the-art community buildings and successful annual fundraising campaigns, it's easy to forget that there is still severe poverty and need in our community. Being involved in the Passover food drive grounds me in the reality of our communal needs.

The statistics are startling. An analysis of Canadian census data from 2001 indicates that 11 per cent of our community lives under the poverty line. The level of child poverty was nearly nine per cent, and more than 20 per cent of Toronto Jewish seniors are poor.

As the economy continues to decline and joblessness continues to increase, the numbers have surely worsened significantly since the census in 2001. Increased reliance on public social welfare is parallelled by increased demand on our community agencies such as Jewish Family and Child (JF&C), Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) and JVS.

Over the course of the last six months, I have been approached by scores of students who, facing difficult financial times, are forced to ask for subsidies and assistance for various educational programs. While communal institutions strive to be inclusive and implement the mantra that "no child should be denied a Jewish education," budgets are tight and some institutions are finding that there simply isn't enough subsidy funding to meet the need.

Assistance doesn't only come in the form of tuition subsidies. Jewish schools often help students afford basic school supplies, books, binders and even gym clothes. The socio-economic diversity in our schools, while often kept private and hidden, is a microcosm of the economic reality of our community at large.

It is critical that we publicly recognize the need within our community. While the Passover food drive has offered me a window into a segment of our community that is often left hidden, many don't have the opportunity to see the need first-hand. Anonymity of the recipient of tzedakah and confidentiality of personal financial circumstances is essential, but if the acute need of the poor is not placed publicly on the communal agenda, their plight can easily be swept under the carpet.

In our tradition we have a special mitzvah of maot chittin, collecting and distributing charity for Passover. The need, however, continues beyond the holiday. It is essential that we help those in need afford the supplies they need to celebrate Passover, but we also have an obligation to ensure that there is food on their tables the next week and the week after that.

All too often the spotlight of Jewish charitable causes skips over the poor of our community. At certain times of the year – during the Passover food drive or the Chanukah toy drive – we campaign for those in need, but the burden of poverty does not lessen during the remainder of the year. In today's economy, it is critical that we give the support needed to the agencies that help those in need. JF&C, JIAS and the kosher food bank, as well as schools and synagogues, work to help those in need. It takes the entire community, however, to ensure that their needs are met.

Once a year, the Passover food drive allows me to look through a window and gain a new perspective on our community. With Passover behind us, it's now time to open the blinds and ensure that these issues are at the centre of our communal charity agenda.

Tel Aviv turns 100, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

If Jerusalem is the City of Gold, then Tel Aviv is the City of White. Tel Aviv has just kicked off its centennial celebrations, and much is being made of the city's unique architecture. Today, a look at what makes the city special and events planned to mark its special birthday.

As for the "white" reference, it refers to one of the city's unique treasures, its White City, "a collection of 4,000 Bauhaus or International-style buildings built in Tel Aviv from the 1930s by German Jewish architects who immigrated to the British Mandate of Palestine after the rise of the Nazis." [tinyurl.com/telaviv11] In July 2003, UNESCO, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, proclaimed Tel Aviv's White City a World Cultural Heritage site. [tinyurl.com/telaviv12]

There are many sites that explore the city's unique architecture. [tinyurl.com/telaviv13] I particularly like this one because it takes advantage of "pano-photography," 360-degree panoramic images that let you simulate being at the centre of the photo and rotate it to take in the sights. [tinyurl.com/telaviv14]

The best way to keep up with this year's special anniversary activities is to download the 72-page official Tel Aviv Centennial Handbook. Anniversary activities include the following.

• The "White Night": party all night and visit the city's museum for free until dawn. (June)

• The inauguration of three walking trails marked by colours emblematic of the city: white (the Urban Heritage Route), Blue (the Sea Route) and Green (the Urban Nature Route). [tinyurl.com/telaviv15] By the way, the Centennial Handbook is one of the best on-line experiences I've had that mimics the feel of thumbing through a physical booklet. [tinyurl.com/telaviv16]

Speaking of walking, Google now provides first-class maps of Tel Aviv (and many other Israeli cities).

What I particularly like is the option that overlays user photos, videos and Wikipedia entries right onto the map, so that you get a real feel for the environs. [tinyurl.com/telaviv17] Google's maps are in English. If you'd like to compare them to the homegrown version, check out Mapa's Hebrew maps. [tinyurl.com/telaviv18] Both services are free.

All too often visitors from abroad spend the bulk of their visit to Israel elsewhere and perhaps make a perfunctory visit to Tel Aviv for some shopping. Doing that means missing some of the best museums and attractions the city has to offer. [tinyurl.com/telaviv19] And don't forget to take in a café or two. The author of this list of favourites seems to take some pride that scores of Tel Aviv cafés have been able to survive and thrive in a city where Starbucks folded and left. "There was just too much competition from local cafés that offered a better product for a lower price." [tinyurl.com/telaviv20]

If you crave being in the White City but don't have a trip planned, you can pick up a copy of Tel Aviv Short Stories. The fiction anthology of 52 stories set in Tel Aviv, written in English by 37 authors, has just been published and gives a wonderful taste of life in the metropolis. [tinyurl.com/telaviv24]

There's a lovely clip on YouTube that gives you a good feel for the city, the book and its authors. [tinyurl.com/telaviv28]

Although there is no shortage of official sites marking the anniversary, I'm partial to the blogs and articles by the city's own denizens. Lisa Goldman had written a charming paean in Forward. [tinyurl.com/telaviv26]

And I'll close with the words of Ashley P.: "Tel Aviv has changed a lot in 18 years, as have I… It has turned into a cool, happening metropolis. OK, so Tel Aviv residents can still be as aggressive as ever and still drive like lunatics, but the Tel Aviv that welcomed me with a cap in hand, and still lived 10 years behind Europe, has turned itself into a bit of a swan. Lots of green parks for the kids to play in, the latest fashions and trends, great places to eat and drink… but, of course, the Med still lapping at those sandy shores. My Tel Aviv: 18 years in a 24-hour city, celebrating 100. Mazal Tov!" [tinyurl.com/telaviv27]

Herb Gray becomes chancellor of Carleton U

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Former deputy prime minister Herb Gray was recently named Carleton University's 10th chancellor.

At a formal ceremony held at the Canadian Museum of Civilization, the longtime former Liberal MP was installed by Carleton's new chair of its board of governors, Jacques Shore.

Victor Rabinovitch, CEO of the Museum of Civilization, has known Gray both personally and professionally for many years. He said hosting the ceremony at his institution was an honour. "For me, it was a double honour – personally and on behalf of the institution – like getting an aliyah on Rosh Hashanah," he said.

This is just the latest honour in a long and distinguished career for Gray. First elected to Parliament as a Liberal member for Windsor West in 1962, he was re-elected in 12 subsequent federal elections. When he resigned from the House of Commons in January 2002 to become Canadian chair of the International Joint Commission, an autonomous international organization that prevents and resolves disputes about fresh water that comprise 40 per cent of the boundary between the United States and Canada, Gray had served for 39 years, six months and 26 days, an unequalled record for continuous days of service in the House.

Gray will continue his work for the Joint Commission, since the role of chancellor is largely ceremonial. One of the main functions is the awarding of degrees twice a year, but Gray is not merely a figurehead.

He plans to help the university carry out its new strategic plan, called "Defining Dreams.

"Not just to define your dreams but to have input into implementing the dreams of the entire Carleton community for the university, this capital city, our country and perhaps even the world," he told the ceremony.

"The development of a great university like Carleton is an ongoing task," Gray added. "In these difficult economic times, it is a challenge, but we have to keep at it."

Quoting from Rabbi Tarfon in Pirkei Avot (Ethics of the Sages), Gray said "You are not required to complete the task, yet you are not free to withdraw from it."

He plans to continue to attend monthly meetings of the board of governors, to meet with Carleton president Roseann O'Reilly Runte and Shore on a regular basis and to generally be involved in what he considers to be as an "almost ambassadorial" role for the university.

Despite his accomplishments, Gray is a quiet and modest man who said he's very "honoured to be chancellor, especially since I am following in the footsteps of some very outstanding people."

His immediate predecessor was Westmount MP Marc Garneau, the former astronaut.

Former MP honorary frat member

By CARA STERN
Special to The CJN

Herb Gray, Carleton University's new chancellor, recently became an honorary member of the international Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi.

Gray, a former deputy prime minister, was installed as Carleton's chancellor on March 5. He was initiated into AEPi on March 23.

"I have become connected with an organization that has, among its members and honorary members, an amazing array of talent, service, and achievement," he said, naming Mark Zuckerberg, the creator of Facebook, and Wolf Blitzer, a senior correspondent for CNN.

First elected to Parliament in 1962, Gray became Canada's first Jewish cabinet minister in 1969. He retired from Parliament in 2002 as Canada's longest serving MP.

Gray's initiation was part of the event Diversity in Brotherhood, which brought together members of AEPi and Omega Psi Phi, a predominantly black fraternity.

Gray noted that both the black and Jewish communities have faced slavery, oppression, discrimination and racism, adding that Passover, as a festival of freedom, links the two communities.

"Particularly in the '60s, [Jewish leaders] marched arm in arm with great black leaders like the Rev. Martin Luther King, and faced physical violence and even death in this cause," he said.

There is a bond between AEPi and Omega Psi Phi in their fights against racism, said Jon Telch, the president of AEPi's Ottawa chapter.

"[The Omega brothers] are just as, if not more, passionate than AEPi about anything in terms of standing up against racism, not only for your own people's sake but everyone else's," he said. "If we both are fighting for the same thing, why not do it together?"

Clement Ndegaya, vice-president of the Ottawa chapter of Omega Psi Phi, said it was important to recognize the similarities between the two cultures.

"People get stuck talking about our differences," he said, adding that in reality, "we have a lot more in common than not."

Michael Mostyn, national director of public affairs for B'nai Brith Canada, was also initiated as an honorary member of AEPi at the event.

Give Mideast peace a chance, student initiative urges

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

McGill University student Daniela Porat was so fed up with the competition between pro-Israeli and pro-Palestinians to get their version of the Middle East conflict to the forefront on campus and the rancour it has engendered that she decided to inject a little empathy into the debate.

In an article in the student newspaper the McGill Daily, she wrote: "I implore McGill's Jewish and Arab groups to unite their efforts in educating students about the Arab-Israeli conflict. Not only will this be an experiment in diplomacy, it will be a testament to our potential as students to mend the fractures that divide our community."

The response was swift. The group Students Taking Action for Medicine and Peace (STAMP), which most recently led a successful fundraising campaign to aid cholera victims in Zimbabwe, took up her challenge. STAMP is an association of mainly medical and dental students; Porat, who is from Toronto, is studying political science and art history.

With STAMP, Porat is spearheading a new campaign at McGill called We Are Peace, aimed at building trust between students on opposite sides of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and giving them an opportunity to get to know one another without partisanship dominating the discourse.

The launch event was held in the lobby of McGill's education department on April 2. More than 50 students, and some others, attended, enjoying falafel and painting a mural with symbols of peace, while Israeli and Arabic music played.

The mural, which contains the dominant message Shalom/Salaam (peace in Hebrew and Arabic), is to hang in McGill's main McLennan Library until June, "as a reminder to interact peacefully and diplomatically," said Porat.

Porat said she had become "distraught over the unbelievable antagonisms developing" on Canadian campuses, including McGill, following the Gaza offensive in December 2008 and January 2009, and during Israeli Apartheid Week in March.

She hopes this initiative is "a small but significant start to moving beyond such negative behaviour."

The mood at the launch was encouraging, she said. "We talked about the conflict, but it was muted and relaxed. Then we talked about everyday things."

We Are Peace is also going to hold a photography competition for students on the subject of Middle East peace. The 12 best submissions will be published in a calendar, that Porat hopes will carry the message of peace throughout the year.

Porat's attachment to Israel is strong and personal; she is sensitive to criticism of Israel, but is trying to understand how the other side feels.

For instance, a recent display in the McLennan Library on the humanitarian crisis in Gaza left her with mixed feelings. "I believe sending aid to the Palestinians is crucial, however, what I found disconcerting about the display was that, as a Jew, I felt I was being attacked with anti-Israel sentiments."

Her grandfather was the only person in his family to survive the Holocaust. After being liberated from Auschwitz, he settled in Israel. She was born in Venezuela.

As she wrote in the Daily: "We have to move beyond the inferences and assumptions that blemish our relations, so that our understandings of each other are not dictated by hate and rather built on a belief that we can learn from past persecutions."

Parkinson's not a barrier to an active lifestyle

Compiled by CJN Staff

Kenny Bearg finds it a little tough to get going in the mornings. He's up at 5 a.m. and is out of the house by 6:30. But for the first moments of the day, he's pretty much at a standstill.

"Whether it's getting dressed or anything else I have to do in the morning, nothing much happens until the meds kick in," Bearg says. "That could take a half-hour to 45 minutes. But once I get going, I'm fine."

Bearg, 57, has Parkinson's disease, a neurodegenerative disorder that affects about 100,000 Canadians. The most common symptoms are tremor, slowness and stiffness, balance problems and muscle rigidity.

The average age of onset of Parkinson's disease is 60, but it can affect people as young as 30 or 40.

Diagnosed with Parkinson's in 2003, at the age of 52, Bearg experiences muscle cramp and his legs get sore, but that doesn't stop him from working out at the gym most mornings before putting in a full day at work.

It's the little things that drive him crazy. He says, "One of the first things in Parkinson's is your handwriting gets very small. It's hard to write. That's one of the worst side effects."

Cutting meat at dinner is another annoyance because his hands are weak. Also, Bearg acknowledges, "My golf game is not what it used to be, but I still play."

His neurologist at the Centre for Movement Disorders in Markham, Ontario; his exercise instructor at Baycrest, where he participates in a Parkinson's exercise group; and the physiotherapists at the clinic he attends twice a week help him to maintain a full and active lifestyle.

Then there's the support he gets from people with Parkinson's. Recalling attending a meeting for people who had Parkinson's for five years or more, Bearg says, "I had only been diagnosed for two weeks, so I didn't know what to expect. But I came out of that meeting feeling great. I saw how well people were handling their Parkinson's five years down the road. They were working out, they were in great shape and they were positive."

Bearg has taken their example to heart. He has since joined a Parkinson's disease support group that meets for lunch once a month. He and his family have also become avid fundraisers for Parkinson Society Canada and participate in SuperWalk for Parkinson's every year. This year SuperWalk takes place on Sept.12 and 13.

He says, "I have great support from my family and friends. I feel lucky that there's so much research now on Parkinson's disease, and I'm just hopeful that one day there's a cure."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I notice that with each passing year, my weight seems to inch up. How can I avoid becoming overweight? Is there a simple answer?

A. Actually, yes there is – don't gain the weight in the first place. I know that sounds sarcastic, harsh and critical, but I am serious. I see people every day, in my office and around me, who are struggling to lose weight. It is inevitable that as we age and our metabolic rate slows down, as we lose muscle mass, as we become less active, as menopause sets in for women, we will gain weight, so wouldn't it be smart if we just made every effort not to become overweight?

If you know losing weight doesn't work for you or is daunting or overwhelming, or if you just long to achieve and maintain a healthy weight over your lifetime, then do what you can to prevent yearly creeping up, which will ultimately lead to your gaining a large amount of weight that needs to be lost.

Be real with yourself. What do you need to make this happen? More activity? Change of activity? Smaller portions of the same food? Stop skipping meals? Healthier choices?

Whatever your weight, healthy or not, at the very least let's just stop gaining. As we age, we need to exercise more and eat less just to maintain the same weight, but it is doable. I see so many people resistant to giving up the foods (or alcohol) they enjoy, or unwilling to do so, and I encourage them to at least cut the portions down – continue to eat those foods but less, and enjoy their food and still lose weight.

So the next time you fear weight gain is on the horizon or are feeling it under your belt and getting overwhelmed with the idea of losing weight, start by maintaining those new practices. They will help people with healthy weights maintain their weight, and for those who are overweight, they may add some healthy habits that will at least mean no further weight gain and may lead to ultimate weight loss, too.

Ottawa hosts Canadian Jewish studies event

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

This year's Association for Canadian Jewish Studies (ACJS) annual conference will be held for the first time in Ottawa from May 24 to 26.

The 33rd annual event, held in conjunction with the Congress for Humanities and Social Sciences, will kick off with a community day that is open to the public at no charge, to be held at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre on May 24.

In addition to morning and afternoon sessions, an exhibit of Jewish Canadiana will be on display, in line with the day's theme, Snapshots of the Jewish Canadian Experience.

Gerald Stone, who recently retired from Library and Archives Canada and who provided exhibit items from his personal collection, will lecture on some of the earliest printed sources on Jewish Canadian life, dating back to the 1750s.

"The goal of the community day is to allow the local community – not just the Jewish community – to hear scholarly lectures on Jewish Canadian studies that they wouldn't have the opportunity to hear unless they were taking a university course," said conference program chair Rebecca Margolis, an assistant professor in the University of Ottawa's Jewish Canadian Studies program.

According to a preliminary schedule, Margolis will be among the presenters on the Sunday, speaking about Les Belles-soeurs and Di shvegerins: Translating Québécois into Yiddish for the Montreal Stage. The play was performed in Yiddish in 1992 in Montreal and, briefly, in Toronto. Speaking with Margolis at the session on Ethnicity and Intercultural Encounters will be Goldie Morgentaler of the University of Lethbridge, who will discuss "Teaching Modern Jewish Literature in the Canadian Bible Belt."

A session on Holocaust and the Canadian Experience will feature Richard Menkis of the University of British Columbia and Harold Troper of the University of Toronto speaking on Tensions in the Canadian Movement to Boycott the 1938 Olympics.

Panels over the subsequent two days at Carleton University will include a session on Jewish cookbooks. Robin Bergart of the University of Guelph's McLaughlin Library, one of two speakers at the cookbook session, will discuss "What's a Christmas Cake Doing in the First Canadian Jewish Cookbook?"

As well, Leo Davids of York University will speak on Jewish Ethnicity in Canada; Monda Halpern of the University of Western Ontario will discuss Scandal and Silence: the Edelson/Horwitz Murder Case; and Hernan Tesler-Mabe of the University of Ottawa will talk about An Appreciation of Gustav Mahler and Jewish-Canadian Identity.

Rebecca Margolis

"One of the nice things about this conference is that we get a lot of really new research," said Margolis. "I'm really pleased with the diversity of the papers and the scholars. There are graduate students, independent researchers and established professors."

A Sunday evening kosher banquet, at $20 a ticket, will honour Ottawa poet Seymour Mayne, who will receive the association's Louis Rosenberg Canadian Jewish Studies Distinguished Service Award.

The University of Ottawa professor is director of and "essentially created" the university's Vered Canadian Jewish Studies program by rallying for it for three decades, said Margolis, who was hired in 2006, the year the program, one of only three of its kind in Canada, was created.

Seymour Mayne

Margolis said Mayne is "extremely committed to created an environment that fosters learning and creativity."

Local singer/songwriter Shelley Posen will perform at the banquet. His Jewish-themed songs are "really fun," Margolis said.

Margolis, who is originally from Montreal, would encourage Montrealers and Torontonians to consider attending the conference.

"People assume that Ottawa is sort of its own entity, the capital of Canada," she said. "It's in the middle of everything. It would be nice to have more connections with Jewish communities that are within driving distance."

UNESCO lists Yiddish program on language preservation registry

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Yiddish Women's Reading Circle recently received recognition from a UN agency.

The program, which features monthly readings in Yiddish of works by female authors, has been listed on the UNESCO (United Nations Educational, Social and Cultural Organization) register of good practices in language preservation.

"It's taken a few years to get listed," says Jeanette Block, one of the reading circle's founders. "Ours is one of just eight groups and the only Yiddish group listed on the registry so far. The registry is getting one million hits a month."

Jeanette Block

UNESCO's Endangered Languages Program launched its register of good practices in language preservation in 2005 as part of its effort to safeguard languages in danger of extinction. "Each of the world's roughly 6,000 languages reflects a unique worldview and culture complex, thus representing an integral part of living human heritage," a UNESCO report says. Yet, experts estimate that today, over 50 per cent of all languages are in danger of extinction. In accordance with UNESCO's Universal Declaration on Cultural Diversity, it is therefore the endangered language program's mission to aid in the preservation of linguistic diversity and to provide assistance to global efforts to safeguard languages.

According to a UN Communication and Information Resources document: "The register provides a knowledge supply and demand base where experience in language protection projects can be accumulated and made publicly available in order to give future preservation projects a head start.

"The rationale behind the... register of good practices in language preservation is simple: a collection of positive experience reports from past and current project agents shall provide a rich source of problem-solving approaches, hands-on solutions, practical information, adaptable models, and dos and don'ts of language preservation, to be easily accessed as a self-help tool for others trying to preserve their languages."

Block notes that Yiddish women's reading circles have a long tradition in Winnipeg. The latest version was started in 2001 at the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre following the closing of the 80-year-old Jewish Public Library. (A sizeable number of the library's Yiddish books were transferred to the Gwen Secter.)

Block reports that attendance over the years has consistently been around 15 to 20. While most of the circle's participants are women, a few men have also dropped in from time to time. This past year, the ladies read the works of Dora Shulner, Shira Gorshman and former Jewish Forwards writer Adella Kean Kamenkin, who, in 1930, published two books of her advice columns for Jewish women newly arrived in America.

While Block notes that there are other Yiddish reading circles in the United States and Canada, what sets the Winnipeg group apart is that it meets in a permanent location. She also believes that an anthology the group published two years ago was an important factor in its being listed by UNESCO.

The book, Arguing with the Storm, is a compilation of short stories written in Yiddish by female authors and translated into English by several ladies in the group. Block's daughter, Rhea Tregebov, a creative writing teacher at the University of British Columbia, served as the anthology's editor.

It was Tregebov who first came across the UNESCO registry and looked into what was involved in qualifying for it. "I received an e-mail about the registry a year before we published the anthology and sent an e-mail to the contact person in Paris," Tregebov says. "I was a little hesitant at first. I wasn't sure that Yiddish would fit the definition. (The other languages currently on the list are Aboriginal languages.) But we received an enthusiastic response."

Block and Tregebov co-wrote the proposal. They pointed out that the reading group costs very little to operate, that it receives support from the Gwen Secter staff and that the program is held in the afternoons to accommodate seniors who may tire early in the evenings.

"There was a lot of back and forth," Tregebov says, "but we are thrilled to be included on the list."

Research levels said comparable to Canada

"It's a mystery. I don't know. There are all kinds of mysteries. Politicians are short-sighted. Education is a long-term enterprise."

Despite his sombre warning, Ciechanover acknowledged that the state of scientific research in Israel at present compares favourably to that of Canada, Europe and the United States, and is far more advanced than in the Arab world.

"They're not players in the game," he said of the Arab scientific establishment. "They (Arab nations) don't invest in science and technology. I don't have Egyptian or Saudi peers."

Turning to another topic, Ciechanover lashed out at international attempts to boycott Israeli academics and universities.

"It shows a basic misunderstanding of academic life," he said. "By boycotting us, you're stopping a transfer of information. What does it achieve?

"Academic life is based on freedom. We're talking about science, not politics. The only way to settle any problem is by talking, not by boycotting. Politics should be kept out of academia."

He himself keeps resolutely away from politics. "You don't want to touch it, even with a 10-foot stick."

Ciechanover charged that organizers of anti-Israel boycotts are anti-Semitic, pure and simple.

"First they blame Jews, and now they have Israel to blame. This is hidden anti-Semitism, a new form of anti-Semitism. These people are anti-Semites. They are motivated by anti-Semitism.

He claimed that Canadians are among the leading proponents of boycotting Israeli scholars and universities.

Ciechanover, who was due to fly to Germany to give a lecture following his trip to Toronto, said he feels uncomfortable in that country.

"I will never forgive or forget," he said, referring to Germany's central role in the Holocaust.

Ciechanover, whose Polish-born parents settled in Palestine in the 1920s, explained he agreed to go to Germany in the interest of fostering scientific cooperation and peace.

"I'm there to promote international collaboration. That's the way to prevent the next disaster and future holocausts."

Asked how the Nobel Prize has personally affected him, Ciechanover replied that it has humbled him profoundly. "I'm humbled by the complexity of nature and by the fragility of life," said Ciechanover, who keeps his Nobel Prize in a bank vault. "I'm humbled by other people's talents."

He has been extremely busy travelling since winning the prize. "It's an overwhelming experience. You get opportunities to see the world and Jewish communities in places like Ecuador and Paraguay."

He also sleeps much less, three hours rather than his usual six hours per night.

In a self-deprecatory observation, he mused, "Nothing has changed. You're the same old fool."

When not travelling, lecturing or teaching, he continues his research. In awarding the Nobel Prize to Ciechanover and his two colleagues, the Nobel committee cited their discovery of "ubiquitin-mediated protein degradation," one of the cell's most important cyclical processes. Thanks to their research, it is now possible to understand, at a molecular level, how a cell controls a number of central processes in the body.

"It's an ever expanding field," he said. "The more we know, the more we're aware of what we don't know. It's really a growing field."

Ciechanover, who was born in 1947, considers himself a patriotic Israeli.

"I grew up with the country. I went to military service, like everyone else. I participated in two wars, in the Six Day War as an orderly and in the Yom Kippur War as a physician."

He is pleased to learn that the Technion, the University of Toronto and Mount Sinai Hospital have agreed to a student exchange.

George Fantus, the associate dean of research at the University of Toronto's faculty of medicine, disclosed that the program is expected to start in the summer of 2010.

Cotler tables two petitions in Parliament

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Irwin Cotler, the Liberal Opposition's special counsel on Human Rights and International Justice, tabled a historic petition to Parliament calling on the government to do more on behalf of abducted Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

At a press briefing last week, Cotler said it was the first time such a petition has been filed in Parliament.

The petition coincided with the 1,000th day of captivity of Schalit, who was abducted by Hamas terrorists on June 25, 2006, in a cross-border raid from Gaza into Israel territory.

Speaking in Parliament last week, Cotler said Schalit, who is believed to be still alive, "is being held in complete isolation."

Irwin Cotler

"The petitioners note that he has been denied any kinds of rights afforded to him under humanitarian law, including the Geneva Convention to which Canada is a state party and which rights Canadians have a commitment to respect."

The petition calls on the Canadian government to insist that bodies such as the Red Cross, the United Nations and other agencies be granted access to Schalit – including family members – as a bare minimum, in addition to being provided firm proof that he is alive.

The government should also insist on Shalit's repatriation to Israel as a "matter of fundamental decency and justice."

"No one even knows where he is being held," Cotler told reporters.

Cotler considered it tantamount to a "standing war crime" that Schalit continued to be held captive.

Cotler also tabled another petition in Parliament on behalf of his Mount Royal constituents and other Quebecers that voiced alarm over an escalating level of state-backed anti-Semitism in Venezuela.

The petition, Cotler told media, was not unrelated to the declaration that emerged from the recent international conference on anti-Semitism in London.

Cotler said Venezuela has seen a "delegitimization from the president [Hugo Chavez] on down of the Jewish people and Israel."

Cotler told Parliament that the events in Venezuela have included "attacks on Jewish persons, property and religious institutions, such as the firebombing of a synagogue in Caracas.

He said members of the Venezuelan Jewish community "fear for their safety and their denial of religious freedom."

Health on the front burner at Kosherfest

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Kosherfest, the world's largest international kosher food show, was truly a kosher feast! The 2008 Kosherfest took place in Secaucus, N.J., with more than 350 exhibitors.

The kosher market is estimated to be a $14-billion industry and is growing at a phenomenal rate. A recent study by Mintel International showed that 77 per cent of consumers preferred kosher because of the quality, whereas only 16 per cent chose kosher because of religious beliefs. The average kosher consumer is under 40 years of age.

In 2008, there were more than 5,400 new kosher products – more than 13 times the number of products in 2003. There are now some 110,000 items with kosher certification, making it easier for consumers today to find kosher products anywhere in the world. Even the larger chain stores such as Costco are expanding their kosher departments. Seven major hotel chains in the United States have or are installing kosher kitchens.

There was a strong emphasis on health at last year's show, with more kosher health products on display than ever before. There was an excellent selection of natural, organic, gluten-free, sugar-free and lactose-free products. Gourmet, Passover, Asian and Israeli products were also strongly represented. Soy nut butter was offered as a peanut butter alternative, and many desserts were advertised as trans fat free. Gourmet frozen sushi that can go from the freezer to the table in minutes was a big hit. Many kosher wines and beverages were also prominently featured.

Kosherfest was international in flavour, bringing together kosher food manufacturers, caterers and distributors from more than 28 countries. Attendees hailed from Turkey, South Africa, Italy, Panama, Israel, Los Angeles, Chicago, New Jersey, Toronto and Montreal.

I met up with Kevin Hopps of Toronto, the previous manager of Sobeys in Thornhill, who was recently appointed the new CEO of Strubs Food Corp., famous for its pickles. Hopps is considered a leading authority on retailing in the kosher market and has worked in this market since he was 16 years old. He received the National Business Leadership Award 2008 from NCSY. In his new position, Hopps remains committed to "provide the best shopping experience for the kosher consumer" and believes that the kosher market will continue to go mainstream and vice versa. For more information about Strubs products, visit www.strubpickles.com.

Here were some of my favourite food finds at the show, both Canadian and international.

Bagel O's are yummy prefilled bite-size bagels which come in whole wheat and regular, filled with plain or flavoured cream cheeses. They go from the freezer to the toaster/oven in minutes, have zero trans fat, no added preservatives and are produced in a nut-free facility. They're distributed by Tastefully Yours Bakers of Toronto. For information contact 1-888-259-6069.

Stacey Kurtz of Toronto, marketing director of Fruit of the Land Products, won the 2008 Fine New Food from Israel Award with Beit Yitzhak's Pomegranate Spread. This luscious line of organic fruit spreads contains no added sugar, additives, preservatives or food colouring. For more information, contact www.fruitoftheland.com or 1-877-311-JAMS.

Zoglo's offered scrumptious samples of its delicious vegetarian products and consumers gobbled them up! The extensive line of healthy vegetarian products includes soy and tofu burgers, vegetable patties, and meatless burgers and wieners. Its Baker's Choice line of stuffed pastries includes mushroom, potato and spinach fillings. Zoglo's also produces hors d'oeuvres, crepes, falafel and assorted snacks for both consumers and foodservice. For more information, visit www.zoglos.com.

Bella Baby Foods, a new line of kosher organic frozen baby foods, won for Best New Organic Product. They are frozen in convenient 1.5-ounce packets so that moms can choose exactly how much food and what food combinations are right for their baby. The baby foods contain no artificial flavours, no added sugar or salt and are wheat- and soy free. They hope to have their products available in Canada soon. Visit www.naturallynora.com for more information.

Katz's Gluten Free Bake Shop (http://katzglutenfree.com) was named a new product winner in the best baked goods category for its delicious gluten-free challah dinner rolls. Owner Fradel Katz first developed gluten-free recipes for her family and later expanded into a full-fledged business with a variety of gluten-free breads, rugelach, muffins and other kosher baked goods. They are beginning to distribute their products in Canada. For more information, visit www.katzglutenfree or call 845-782-5307.

Levana Kirschenbaum, cookbook author and cooking teacher, introduced her new line of scrumptious baked goods which included whole grain spelt cakes, cookies, muffins and quick breads. Her products are pareve, low in gluten, high in protein and use natural ingredients. Her new product line was met with rave reviews. Her products are not available in Canada yet, but you can order by calling 718-927-4603 or visiting her website at http://www.levanadesserts.com/order.html.

I discovered a wonderful product, Kolatin Real Kosher Gelatin, which is produced by Glatech. This high quality gelatin is identical to non-kosher gelatin, without the rubbery texture associated with other kosher gelatins. Kolatin is pareve and kosher for Passover. It is currently available for manufacturers and will soon be available for consumers. For information, visit www.koshergelatin.com or phone 732-364-8700.

Attendees were thrilled to learn that you don't have to go to Israel to obtain professional training in a kosher cooking school. The Center for Kosher Culinary Arts in Brooklyn offers both professional and recreational cooking classes and has just added Techniques for Healthy Cooking to the curriculum. Visit the website at www.kosherculinaryarts.com or call 718-758-1339.

Naturally Norah offers a line of delicious all-natural cake and frosting mixes with no artificial flavours, colours, preservatives or hydrogenated oils. They are dairy-free, nut-free and gluten-free. The unique packaging protects against freezer odour and freezer burn. Central Epicure Food Products will be distributing this line in Canada. For information, contact Michael Nadler at 416-745-4323.

Mapping the possible Netanyahu-Obama fault lines

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

Analysis

There are no fissures yet between the young Obama and Netanyahu administrations, but political geologists are mapping the fault lines.

So far, two major potentials for quakes have emerged, both having to do with timing: one concerns the pace of negotiating Palestinian statehood; the other has to do with projections about when Iran's alleged nuclear program becomes irrevocably dangerous.

The potential for differences about talks with the Palestinians emerged last week when Avigdor Lieberman, the nativist who ran to Benjamin Netanyahu's right during the election, gave his maiden speech as foreign minister.

"There is one document that binds us and it is not the Annapolis Conference," Lieberman said on April 1, a day after the new government was sworn in, referring to the process launched in late 2007 by the Bush administration. "That has no validity."

Instead, he said, Israel was bound by the "road map" peace plan, the outline for a two-state solution launched by former U.S. president George W. Bush in 2003. "It is a binding resolution, and it binds this government as well," he said, referring to the UN Security Council resolution that sanctified the "road map."

Israeli officials and pro-Israel officials in Washington strove last week to emphasize Lieberman's embrace of the "road map" as the first concrete sign that the Netanyahu government was committed to a two-state solution. Netanyahu's refusal before assuming power to make it a pillar of his foreign policy – a refusal that drove the moderate Kadima party away from the coalition – had stirred White House anxiety.

In fact, however, Lieberman's explicit – even derisive – rejection of the Annapolis process signalled a possible major strategic difference between the United States and Israel.

The "road map" had emphasized sequencing, a major concession to Israeli demands that the Palestinian Authority shows it is capable of containing terrorist violence before it achieves statehood. The previous administrations in both countries – Olmert in Israel and Bush in the United States – agreed to leapfrog the sequencing requirement after Hamas forced moderates out of the Gaza Strip in 2006; it was no longer considered reasonable to expect Mahmoud Abbas, the PA president, to be responsible for controlling an area where his forces had no presence.

The result was the Annapolis process, which encouraged the sides to come up with final status solutions as a means of enticing Gaza Palestinians to reject the militancy of their Hamas overlords.

"What Annapolis does is, it takes the 'road map's' phases as the basis for implementation but seeks to define the endgame first," said David Makovsky, a senior analyst at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy think-tank.

Lieberman made it clear that was off the table: Israel was returning to an expectation of a holistic end to violence before it agreed to advance the peace process.

"I will never agree to our waiving all the clauses – I believe there are 48 of them – and going directly to the last clause, negotiations on a permanent settlement," he said. "No. These concessions do not achieve anything. We will adhere to it to the letter, exactly as written. Clauses one, two, three, four – dismantling terrorist organizations, establishing an effective government, making a profound constitutional change in the Palestinian Authority."

The response from the Obama administration was swift and came from its highest reaches – the president himself.

"Let me be clear: the United States strongly supports the goal of two states, Israel and Palestine, living side by side in peace and security," Barack Obama said in an address last week to the Turkish parliament. "That is a goal shared by Palestinians, Israelis, and people of goodwill around the world. That is a goal that the parties agreed to in the 'road map' and at Annapolis. That is a goal that I will actively pursue as president of the United States."

Mentioning Annapolis was no coincidence, Makovsky said.

"For the United States, that has worked on this process for the last couple of years, it's an important dimension," he said. "Obama's speech in Turkey was a bid to define where the United States stands."

There were signs that the issue was not about to disappear. Netanyahu issued a statement subsequent to Obama's speech that did not reference the speech and that was emphatically vague.

"Israel appreciates President Obama's commitment to Israel's security and to the pursuit of peace," it said. "The government of Israel is committed to both of these goals and will formulate its policies in the near future so as to work closely with the United States towards achieving these common objectives."

A minister from Netanyahu's Likud Party sounded a more belligerent tone. "Israel does not take orders from Obama," Gilad Erdan, the environmental affairs minister, told the Jerusalem Post after Obama's speech. "In voting for Netanyahu, the citizens of Israel have decided that they will not become the U.S.'s 51st state."

Obama has been careful to emphasize that he will take into account Israeli concerns. During his campaign, he enjoyed reminding reporters that he likes making difficult points to constituencies that may not be happy to hear what he has to say. That was evident last week when he told a roundtable of Turkish university students pressing him on the close U.S.-Israel alliance that he rejected those who would reflexively dismiss Israel's concerns.

"In the Muslim world, this notion that somehow everything is the fault of the Israelis lacks balance – because there's two sides to every question," Obama said. "That doesn't mean that sometimes one side has done something wrong and should not be condemned. But it does mean there's always two sides to an issue. I say the same thing to my Jewish friends, which is, 'You have to see the perspective of the Palestinians.'"

It's not clear yet how mainstream pro-Israel groups and their friends in Congress would line up should a fissure emerge.

One shot across the bow came in the form of a letter from Democratic Congressman Eliot Engel, published in the Washington Post.

"For a two-state solution to become a reality, Palestinians in both the West Bank and the Gaza Strip must recognize the right of Israel to exist as a Jewish state," Engel said. "They must also renounce terrorism and understand that they cannot use terrorism as a negotiating tool to achieve their state. The Palestinians must also agree to abide by all previous agreements signed by their leadership."

He concluded with an allusion to pressures on Israel to come up with a final status document. "Peace will come to that region of the world when both sides recognize each other's right to exist in peace and security. It will not come from pressuring Israel to make unilateral concessions in return for worthless promises or worthless pieces of paper," he said.

Dovish pro-Israel groups, including J Street and the Israel Policy Forum, are already lining up behind the White House.

The two leaders met last year in Jerusalem. [Israel photo]

The Israel Policy Forum sent a letter to Hillary Rodham Clinton, the secretary of state, and Daniel Shapiro, the chief Israel-Palestinian officer at the National Security Council, asking them to urge Netanyahu to abjure settlement expansion and the Palestinians to prevent violence and stop incitement. The letter comes amid reports that Netanyahu struck a secret deal with Lieberman to build a settlement in "E1," a plot of land that bridges Jerusalem and the Ma'aleh Adumim settlement – and that Palestinians say will strangle a north-south corridor that is critical to a viable state.

Israel Briefs

Olmert hearing postponed

Israel's Supreme Court granted Ehud Olmert's request to postpone a hearing in one of the cases against him in order to seek cancer treatment abroad. Justice Miriam Naor ruled that the hearing cannot be held before May 10. Olmert had been scheduled to appear before Attorney General Menachem Mazuz on April 19 in the Rishon Tours affair. Mazuz has warned the former prime minister's attorneys that he plans to indict Olmert in the case. Mazuz had rejected a request to postpone the hearing, despite a letter saying Olmert's cancer required immediate treatment. Olmert's attorneys petitioned the court earlier in the week to postpone the hearing and also requested that Mazuz organize a joint hearing on all three of the affairs in which the attorney general has indicated he will serve an indictment. Olmert was scheduled to fly to the United States on April 13 for treatment of his prostate cancer, which was diagnosed more than a year ago.

Leonard Cohen in Israel

Leonard Cohen will arrive in Israel in September, as part of his European tour. According to the singer's official forum, Cohen, who will turn 75 later this year, is expected to perform in Israel on Sept. 24. An attorney for Marcel Abraham, who will produce the concert, confirmed that the Israeli concert will indeed take place and said that he has received an e-mail finalizing Cohen's arrival. The likely venue for the concert is Ramat Gan stadium.

Kotel stones

A new conservation project to preserve the stones in the Western Wall has been instituted by the Israel Antiquities Authority. Israeli architects surveyed the holy site last year after some pieces of stone fell, and found that many of them were deteriorating. Over the next three months, each stone will be individually inspected and new mortar put in as needed. The project to conserve the stones in the Western Wall, and the conservation and development of the Western Wall compound, is one of the most complex projects of its kind ever undertaken in Israel, according to the antiquities authority. "The Western Wall and the monuments around it are among the most important cultural heritage sites in the world. Every year millions of people come to Jerusalem to see them. In order to ensure a safe and comfortable experience, the site should be constantly maintained and new services developed for the benefit of the visitors," an Antiquities news release stated.

Hezbollah active in Cairo

Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah admitted that his agents in Cairo were helping Hamas in the Gaza Strip. Nasrallah confirmed that a member of a cell of 49 men with links to Hezbollah was providing logistical help to Hamas, according to reports. Sami Shihab, a Lebanese citizen, was arrested in Cairo. Members of Egypt's parliament are demanding that Nasrallah be placed on trial for allegedly dispatching his agents. The Hezbollah agents operating in Egypt were plotting to attack Israeli tourists at resorts in the Sinai Peninsula, Egyptian and Israeli officials said Sunday. Nine of the agents were charged by Egypt with spying for Hezbollah, according to reports.

Ha'aretz investigation

IDF reservists have asked Israel's attorney general to investigate a major newspaper for publishing testimonies by soldiers alleging human rights violations. More than 46 reservists who served in Israel's recent military operation in Gaza sent a letter to Attorney General Menachem Mazuz asking him to launch a criminal investigation against Ha'aretz for publishing the claims of at least two soldiers without checking to make sure they were real.The soldiers said later that they did not actually witness the incidents. An IDF investigation determined that the events described never happened.

Activists planning to counter-protest

Yet the Israeli-Palestinian conflict won't be the only provocative subject: the forum may become a flashpoint for newer tensions between Islam and the West. With some European states still threatening a boycott, the 57-member Organization of the Islamic Conference will likely accuse the West of Islamaphobia and press to restrict criticism of Islam – and perhaps overwhelm all other grievances on the agenda.

"It's part of the Islamic group's strategy: rather than deal with extremist Islam, they take an offensive position and say Islam is the victim of western crimes," says Hillel Neuer, executive director of the Geneva-based UN Watch. "What else will they talk about – genocide in Darfur?"

The original Durban conference – particularly the NGO forum that preceded it – was a seminal UN event in Jewish pro-Israel activism, echoing the "Zionism is Racism" era from 1975 to 1991.

Though some had warned the Arab-Muslim bloc – backed by developing-world allies – angled to produce an indictment of Israel at Durban, the on-the-ground reality shocked them.

The NGO document, hammered out in a hostile, intimidating environment, painted the Jewish state as the world's greatest perpetrator.

The text was so extreme, then-UN high commissioner for human rights, Mary Robinson, rejected it – a stunning blow for the host agency. Even today, the new commissioner, Navi Pillay, denounces "the virulent anti-Semitic behaviour" at Durban, though only blames some groups "on the sidelines."

What critics overlook is that while conference diplomats also inveighed against Israel, they excised the worst language. Nevertheless, the final text, under the heading, "Victims of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and related intolerance," lamented "the plight of the Palestinian people."

Hillel Neuer

In the context of an anti-racism proclamation, Israel's defenders say this implies racism – a charge they say has nothing to do with what they view as a political conflict. The Durban document identified no other state, so this remains a sticking point eight years later.

Observers expect Iran, Syria and others to level more charges against Israel in Geneva, but it's unclear whether Europe will allow them to revise the document.

Likewise, the 2005 Danish cartoons of the Muslim prophet Muhammad – which sparked Muslim protests that turned violent – have spurred a "defamation of religions" movement that is seen as an effort to stifle criticism of Islam.

Jewish NGOs will be among those pressing the European Union to focus on topics they deem more legitimate. They'll also be networking with like-minded NGOs.

"While some groups try to bring as much harm and pain as possible to Israel, my job will be to build up a coalition among those who realize their agenda is being hijacked," says Shimon Samuels, director for international relations for the Simon Wiesenthal Center."

To avert some of the rowdiness of Durban, UN diplomats decided to eliminate the NGO forum and hold this session at their secure Geneva campus.

Instead, activists will joust farther away to win hearts and minds.

Presumably drawing TV cameras will be a major anti-Israel demonstration – especially with the International Jewish Anti-Zionist Network, a highly visible co-sponsor – and a "Warsaw to Gaza" event that links Israelis to Nazis.

Meanwhile, where Durban I was a milestone that launched a campaign against Israel similar to what aimed to dismantle apartheid South Africa – the ongoing "Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions" movement – Durban II will take the campaign one step further.

One organizer says leading legal minds – including several from apartheid-era South Africa – will huddle to figure out how to make the apartheid charge stick against Israel.

"Apartheid is already defined as a crime against humanity, but there's not a lot of experience in taking it to court," says Ingrid Gassner Jaradat, director of the Bethlehem-based BADIL Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights. "If you strengthen the legal argument, educate and raise awareness, you also strengthen the efforts to prosecute this as a war crime."

Jewish activists are planning to counter-punch.

On April 20, Swiss Jewish groups will host a Holocaust commemoration that features Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel, French philosopher Bernard-Henri Levy, and others.

The event will be expressly non-political, with pamphlets and posters barred, says Sabine Simkhovitch-Dreyfus, vice-president of the Swiss Federation of Jewish Communities.

However, the organizers also chose a highly symbolic location for the ceremony – in the large square just outside the main entrance to the UN compound.

"It's possible that it will be perceived by certain persons as politicizing the Shoah," says Simkhovitch-Dreyfus. "But this is certainly not our intention. To the contrary, we want to draw the attention of all delegates to a universal message. And we think the Shoah is one of the keys, if not the key universal, anti-racism message."

Moreover, some 40 human-rights groups will sponsor a Geneva Summit for Human Rights, Tolerance and Democracy to showcase Burmese, Cuban, Iranian and Egyptian dissidents; Jewish groups will co-host a Conference Against Racism, Discrimination and Persecution – viewed by some as a virtual "alternative" to the actual Durban conference – and Jewish and Israeli groups will put on an Israel Wants Peace rally – with activist and former Israeli government minister Natan Sharansky, Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz, and Ethiopian and Bedouin Israelis.

In related developments, senior U.S. officials in Washington and New York are leaning in favour of participating in the conference, diplomatic sources said on Sunday.

The diplomats, who share a close working relationship with the American delegation to the United Nations, informed leading Jewish officials in New York that Washington has increasingly become convinced of the need to dispatch representatives to the conference.

Leading figures in the organized American Jewish community have been lobbying western ambassadors and European diplomats in the UN to dissuade their governments from participating in the Geneva summit.

A senior Jewish activist who took part in some of the discussions with western diplomats told Ha'aretz that he would not be the least surprised if the United States indeed decides to send an official delegation. The official said that while the United States pledged it would not participate, it was not an adamant about its opposition.

Dozens of human rights groups and activists in the United States have petitioned President Barack Obama to rethink his decision to boycott the conference, expected by many countries to be used as a forum for criticizing Israel.

UN officials said a few weeks ago that Muslim-backed references to "defamation of religion" and criticism of Israel have been dropped from a draft being prepared for next month's world racism meeting.

Initial draft resolutions for the Durban II summit branded Israel as an occupying state that carries out racist policies. It now speaks only of concern about the negative stereotyping of religions and doesn't single out Israel for criticism, according to the officials.

Iran reportedly has ability to create nuclear fuel

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Saturday that with the opening of a new facility to produce uranium pellets, Iran now controls the entire cycle for producing nuclear fuel.

Ahmadinejad has announced several times in the past that Iran has the knowledge necessary to enrich uranium ore into fuel pellets, but with the opening of the new facility, the Islamic republic says it now has the capability.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Speaking on Iranian state television, Ahmadinejad said the next step for Iran is to achieve proficiency in building nuclear power plants without help from foreign countries.

The United States and some of its allies accuse Iran of seeking to build nuclear weapons. Iran has denied the charges, saying its nuclear program is merely geared towards power generation.

The German newsmagazine Der Spiegel published a wide-ranging interview with Ahmadinejad on Saturday, in which the president of the Islamic Republic said U.S. President Barack Obama's overtures to Iran show a "lack of something decisive" and should be followed by action.

"Great things are happening in the United States," Ahmadinejad told Der Spiegel. "I believe that the Americans are in the process of initiating important developments."

Ahmadinejad critical of Obama administration

When it was suggested that the president's moderate tone toward Iran represents a possible turning point in American-Iranian relations, Ahmadinejad expressed cautious reservation.

"I haven't understood Obama's comments quite that way," he told Der Spiegel. "I pay attention to what he says today. But that is precisely where I see a lack of something decisive. What leads you to talk about a new beginning? Have there been any changes in American policy? We welcome changes, but they have yet to occur."

In commenting on Washington's readiness to enter into talks with Tehran over its nuclear program, Ahmadinejad told Der Spiegel that the ball is in the U.S. court.

"We support talks on the basis of fairness and respect," he said. "That has always been our position. We are waiting for Obama to announce his plans, so that we can analyze them.

"Fundamental changes must take place to the benefit of all parties. The American government must finally learn lessons from the past."

Ahmadinejad repeated his attacks against Israel's legitimacy, claiming that the Palestinians bore the brunt of the consequences of World War II and the Holocaust.

"Why did the Germans cause so much trouble back then, allowing these problems to arise in the first place? The Zionist regime is the result of World War II," he said. "What does any of this have to do with the Palestinian people? Or with the Middle East region? I believe that we must get to the root of the problem. If one doesn't consider the causes, there can be no solution."

He said his country is not alone in its opposition to Israel's presence in the Middle East.

"Do you believe that the German people support the Zionist regime? Do you believe that a referendum could be held in Germany on this question? If you did allow such a referendum to take place, you would discover that the German people hate the Zionist regime.

"I do not believe that the European countries would have been as indulgent if only one-hundredth of the crimes that the Zionist regime has committed in Gaza had happened somewhere in Europe. Why on earth do the European governments support this regime?"

In the interview with Der Spiegel, Ahmadinejad again denied suspicions Tehran is working toward building nuclear weapons. Instead, he intimated that Israel's possession of nuclear weapons should be the primary source of concern in the region.

"We have no interest in building a nuclear weapon," Ahmadinejad said. "We have sent the IAEA [International Atomic Energy Agency] thousands of pages of reports and made thousands of hours of inspections possible. The IAEA cameras monitor our activities. Who is dangerous and whom should the inspectors distrust? Those who secretly built the bomb, or us, who are co-operating with the IAEA?"

Claims Conference ועידת התביעות
The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany

SECOND APPLICATION TO HARDSHIP FUND FROM PRIOR INELIGIBLE NAZI VICTIMS NOW PERMITTED FOLLOWING CLAIMS CONFERENCE NEGOTIATIONS WITH GERMANY

Jewish victims of Nazism who, upon the date of filing an application to the Hardship Fund of the Claims Conference were found not eligible, will now be given the opportunity to submit a second application. Relevant for the decision of these applications is the current situation of the applicant both as it relates to the applicant's current age and physical condition as well as any new historical evidence that has become available.

Potentially eligible Nazi victims who do not receive a letter from the Claims Conference are asked to contact the Claims Conference in order to commence a second application. Up to now, once a final decision had been made on a case, a second application was not permitted under the German rules based on changed circumstances. This decision affects Nazi victims rejected by the Hardship Fund who are alive as of March 19, 2009. For Nazi victims who were rejected by the Claims Conference and who are alive as of March 19, 2009 but pass away after that date, the Claims Conference is permitted to accept second applications from the spouse, or if the spouse is deceased, the child(ren) of the applicant. Any applications from such a spouse or child(ren) must be received by December 31, 2010.

Note: This decision includes eligible Nazi victims who have reached a certain age (65 for men, 60 for women), where the Nazi victim is presumed to have suffered the necessary damage to health required by the Hardship Fund.

In accordance with the German Government rules governing second applications, persons who, in connection with an application for one-time assistance under the Hardship Fund Guidelines, received a payment from the Claims Conference are not entitled to apply.

The Hardship Fund makes one-time payments of €2,556 to eligible applicants. The eligibility criteria for this program are determined by the German government, and applicants must meet those criteria to receive a payment. The full eligibility criteria for the Hardship Fund can be found at www.claimscon.org.

The Hardship Fund, established in 1980, has paid approximately $876 million to 325,000 Jewish victims of Nazism. The Claims Conference has continuously negotiated with Germany for changes to the program's eligibility criteria in order to be able to make payments to additional Nazi victims.

Book presents colourful history of Warner Brothers

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

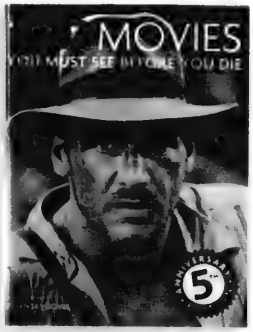
You Must Remember This: The Warner Bros. Story (Running Press) is an engaging, fully illustrated coffee-table book recounting the many cinematic milestones and less-than-memorable B-films churned out by the Warner Brothers Studio, one of the major filmmaking factories of Hollywood's golden era.

One of the most significant films to emerge from the hallowed Warner Brothers Studio was its "supreme triumph" of 1927 – The Jazz Singer, starring an already legendary Al Jolson, who at 42 should have been far too old for the part. Sappily sentimental, The Jazz Singer is primarily remembered today because it was the first talking motion picture or "talkie."

According to co-authors Richard Schickel and George Perry, elements of The Jazz Singer would foretell what the studio would become in its heyday as a Hollywood colossus over the next three decades.

The film's use of an urban, lower-class setting, and its depiction of the struggle between immigrant parents and a son striving to be a fully realized American – a jazz singer instead of a cantor like his father – would be reflected in scores of realistic, socially relevant Warner Brothers pictures in the '30s, '40s and '50s. In that era the studio mass-produced many "tough, violent, wisecracking, and above all socially conscientious movies that were unlike those of any of its competitors," Schickel and Perry write.

Only 70 movie theatres across America were wired for sound when The Jazz Singer made its debut in New York – which none of the four Warner brothers attended: they were obliged to return to California for the funeral of brother Sam, tragically felled by a stroke.



Cover of 1001 Movies You Must See Before You Die

A little-known postscript is that the Warners made a 1928 sequel called The Singing Fool. Starring "Jolie" as a singing waiter on his way to stardom. It became the biggest money-maker in Hollywood history until Gone With The Wind in 1939. Critics, however, regarded it as one of the worst major studio films of all time.

You Must Remember This presents a capsule history of the famous brothers – one of whom, Jack Warner, was born in London, Ont., in 1892; the Polish-Jewish family moved to Youngstown, Ohio, two years later. Their father tried a variety of occupations including fur trader (in Canada), cobbler, butcher and grocer. In 1903 the family bought a projector for $150 and began showing films to the public; they opened a nickelodeon in 1907.

Just over a decade later the brothers bought the rights to My Four Years in Germany, a bestselling WWI memoir that they translated it into a money-making docudrama. They purchased their first Hollywood production centre in 1919 and were saved from bankruptcy in the 1920s through the immense popularity of the cinematic canine Rin-Tin-Tin.

The book's main purpose is to highlight the studio's many outstanding films down the years, spotlighting such stars as George Arliss, James Cagney, Bette Davis, Gary Cooper, Barbara Stanwyck, Joan Blondell, Errol Flynn, Henry Fonda, Humphrey Bogart, Edward G. Robinson, Paul Muni, Leslie Howard, Ingrid Bergman, Cary Grant, James Dean, Judy Garland and Joan Crawford – to name only a few. The roster of directors includes Michael Curtiz, Busby Berkeley, Walter Huston, Frank Capra and Alfred Hitchcock.

Poster of The Jazz Singer, the milestone 1927 film starring Al Jolson, as it appears in You Must Remember This: The Warner Bros. Story.

Page by page, the book marches relentlessly from a glorious past to an equally glorious but sometimes-dubious present. Warner Brothers classic films – again, naming only a few – include Little Caesar, White Heat, Casablanca, The Maltese Falcon, Treasure of the Sierra Madre, Mildred Pierce, Life With Father, Rope, A Streetcar Named Desire, Rio Bravo, Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf, Bonnie and Clyde, The Wild Bunch, Woodstock, Clockwork Orange, The Exorcist, Harry Potter, The Color Purple, Batman and Sweeney Todd. The tradition of excellence continued even after the demise of the studio system in the '60s.

For the most popular films, the book offers full-colour movie posters and behind-the-scenes set photographs, while many more B-level entries receive honourable mention in the lively and intelligent text. Schickel and Perry compiled the book as an adjunct to a PBS television series, but it stands up well on its own as a worthy celebration of some of the greatest films of all time.

I've been on a movie kick the last few months, seeking out and watching hard-to-find cinematic classics from decades past. In particular, I've been drawn to the 1930s, the decade in which the cinema reached its maturity with such gems as It Happened One Night, Dinner At Eight, Counsellor-At-Law, The Wedding Night, Nothing Sacred, His Girl Friday, My Man Godfrey, They Made Me A Criminal and The Champ.

Discerning film lovers may feel the need for a good reference guide to help in tracking down worthy titles. Updated annually, Leonard Maltin's Movie Guide offers a succinct TV-Guide-style summation of cast and plot; with more than 16,000 films listed, it makes up in quantity what it may sometimes lack in quality. As a reflection of its worth, this guide is available for customer reference in many independent video-rental stores.

Maltin's entry for The Jazz Singer, for example, is typically brief but loaded with details. It informs us that cast members included William Demarest (the Hollywood warhorse who played Uncle Charlie in TV's My Three Sons) and Myrna Loy as an uncredited chorus girl, and that the 1953 remake by Michael Curtiz is as schmaltzy and sentimental as the original. (The 1980 remake, starring Neil Diamond, carries the dreaded "BOMB" rating in place of the usual one-to-four stars.)

Movie buffs who need more information will appreciate 1001 Movies You Must See Before You Die (Barrons), a 960-page, full-colour compendium edited by Steven Jay Schneider. It's a pleasure to leaf through this thick and lavishly illustrated volume, which lists titles chronologically, usually one or two per page, with sidebars detailing cast, director and other talent along with information on Oscar nominations and wins.

As expected, major works by Alfred Hitchcock, Preston Sturges, Vittorio De Sica, Quentin Tarantino, the Coen brothers and other celebrated directors receive the prominent treatment they deserve. Refreshingly un-Hollywood-centric, the book is strong on foreign titles such as The Bicycle Thief (Italy, 1948), The Shop On Main Street (Czech, 1965), Kippur (Israel, 2000) and Gwoemul (Korea, 2006). The recent 5th Anniversary Edition also provides convenient indexes of directors and genres, as well as a checklist by which one may keep track of films watched.

Although one might quibble at the inclusion of some questionable entries (I would have omitted Natural Born Killers, The Usual Suspects, Kill Bill and The Passion of the Christ, for example), 1001 Movies You Must See Before You Die not only offers a credible one-volume guide to world cinema but also an unassailable argument for renewing your membership at the local independent video rental shop.

Kids' films from Australia and Holland explore important themes

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The 12th annual edition of Sprockets, the Toronto International Film Festival for Children, runs from April 18-24. Two of its films will be of particular interest to Jewish viewers.

Hey Hey It's Esther Blueberger is a coming-of-age feature-length movie from Australia about a socially awkward Jewish girl who longs for acceptance.

Directed by Cathy Randall, and co-presented by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, Hey Hey It's Esther Blueberger focuses on the above-mentioned girl, an outcast in the private school she attends in an unnamed Australian city.

Being different and somewhat eccentric, Esther (Danielle Catanariti), an intelligent and sensitive person, is ostracized by the snotty girls in her class.

That's a problem because she wants to invite them to her forthcoming bat mitzvah. Sensing that they will ignore her invitation, she wonders whether she's "normal."

These thoughts vanish after she meets Sunni (Keisna Castle-Hughes), a cool girl in another school. Sunni likes Esther precisely because she's not a boring conformist. Their friendship is cemented by Sunni's attendance at Esther's bat mitzvah and by Esther's decision to pose as a Swedish exchange student at Sunni's public school.

This likeable but slow-moving film, which features the winsome Toni Collette as Sunni's unemployed single mother, fleshes out two sub-plots. The first revolves around Esther's brother, Jacob, who's having a problem coping with anti-Semitic jokes at his school. The second focuses on Esther's deteriorating relationship with her mother.

In essence, the film celebrates the virtues of individuality and the importantance of being true to yourself.

Porajmos, a 16-minute documentary from Holland with English subtitles, turns on a teenaged gypsy who visits Auschwitz and is transformed by it.

Directed by Erik Fusco, it is set in Amsterdam and Auschwitz.

Maira Weiss, a 16-year-old Roma brought up in a trailer park with her siblings, is ambivalent about her heritage.

But after visiting the Roma pavillion in Auschwitz, where tens of thousands gypsies were murdered by the Nazis during the Holocaust, Maira forms a stronger bond with her often demeaned culture.

The film underscores the fact that ethnicity is a focal point of identification.

Hey Hey It's Esther Blueberger will be screened at Canada Square 1 on April 18 at 4:20 p.m., April 20 at 12 p.m. and April 21 at 9:45 a.m. At the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, it will be shown on April 19 at 3:15 p.m. at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Grande.

Porajmos will be screened at Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Grande 8 on April 20 at 10 a.m. and April 22 at 1 p.m.

A wide-ranging selection from the Jewish Film Festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Yves Jeuland's Being Jewish in France is an absorbing and sprawling documentary. It will be screened in two parts, on Sunday, April 19 at 6 p.m. and on Monday, April 20 at 7 p.m. Both screenings are at the Al Green Theatre.

A history of France's modern Jewish community, its departure point is the exoneration of Alfred Dreyfus, an army officer who was falsely accused of treason and whose case divided a nation. The file footage of his reinstatement is atmospheric and priceless.

As Jeuland suggests, the Dreyfus affair was the culmination of an anti-Semitic campaign spearheaded by such far right propagandists as Edouard Drumont.

The film, whose archival footage is supplemented by interviews with prominent French Jews, documents the immigration of Eastern European and Balkan Jews to France, the rift between Yiddish-speaking and assimilated members of the community, the rise of fascism, the upsurge of anti-Semitism in the 1930s, and the Vichy era after Germany's invasion in 1940.

In the second episode, it examines the impact of the Holocaust on a community that lost one-quarter of its population, the settlement and absorption of North African Jews, the attitude of Ashkenazi Jews toward Sephardi newcomers, France's fleeting alliance with Israel, and the effect of the Six Day War on French Jews.

Jeuland also explores France's complicity in the Holocaust and its attempts to come to terms with its role and the tension between Jews and Arabs following the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising in 2000.

Eran Riklis' Hebrew and Arabic language film, Lemon Tree (April 23, 3:45 p.m. at the Cinema Odeon Sheppard Grande), navigates the rocky shoals of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Hiam Abbass, right, plays a Palestinian widow in Lemon Tree.

Set in contemporary Israel, it turns on a grove of lemon trees near the so-called seam line, the border between Israel and the West Bank. Salma Zidane (Hiam Abbass), a Palestinian widow, tends to her lemons with tender loving care. But when Israel's new defence minister, Israel Navon (Doron Tavory), and his wife, Mira (Rona Lipaz-Michael), take up residence in a house next to Zidane's orchard, all hell breaks loose.

Israel's security service, concerned that terrorists may infiltrate through the grove and assassinate the minister, advises Navon to cut it down and erect a fence around it. In private, Navon opposes the recommendation. Nonetheless, he accepts it.

Salma rails against the order, viewing it as an infringement of her private property rights. She enlists the aid of a young Palestinian lawyer, Ziad Daud (Ali Suliman), who lodges an appeal to Israel's military court and falls hard for Salma's feminine charms. Since the court upholds the government's position, Salma takes her case to the next level, the Supreme Court.

If nothing else, Lemon Tree, ably directed by Riklis, is an allegory about Israel's long-running conflict with the Palestinians. Riklis focuses on the land question – an integral component of that bitter dispute – by building his film around Salma's lemon trees. Though he is basically sympathetic to Salma's plight, he hardly ignores Israel's need for security.

The cast is quite impressive, with Abbass and Lipaz-Michael leading the way. A thoughtful film, Lemon Tree offers a disturbing glimpse into one facet of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

It is scheduled to open in Toronto theatres in May.

Little Traitor (Sunday, April 19 after the screening of Amos Oz at the Al Green Theatre), directed by Lynn Roth, is based on a story by that Israeli author and unfolds in Hebrew and English. It is set in Jerusalem in 1947, during the fading British Mandate.

Proffy (Edo Porat), an 11-year-old boy who likes playing war games and whose Polish-born parents work for the Jewish underground, is caught breaking the curfew by a British sergeant named Stephen Dunlop (Alfred Molina).

Rather than arresting him, Dunlop – an amiable man who reads the Bible and is trying to learn Hebrew – escorts Proffy to his home. Eventually, the sergeant and the precocious boy form a strong bond. Their unusual friendship is pointedly questioned by Proffy's anti-British friends and equated with treason, leading to unforeseen consequences.

At once brooding and joyful, Little Traitor coaxes great performances from its lead actors.

Jerusalem Day (Monday, April 20 at 2 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre), by Jonathan Aroch, focuses on a patriotic but polarizing Israeli holiday that has commemorated the unification of the city since the Six Day War.

For the national religious camp, the holiday summons up messianic fervour and signifies Israel's conquest of the territories. But to Israelis not so religiously or nationally inclined, Jerusalem Day is an exercise in nationalistic excess or an inconvenience from a business point of view. For Palestinians, it is nothing less than an affront.

The film is augmented by interviews with veterans who fought in Jerusalem and who agree that the battles there were among the most difficult of the war.

The Sway machinery plays ancient prayers to a bluesy beat

Sway Machinery guitarist and singer Jeremiah Lockwood, who was influenced by his grandfather Jacob Konigsberg – a famous cantor – incorporates Jewish prayers into his music. [Jori Klein photo]

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to The CJN

Prayers such as Avinu Malkeinu and Anim Zmiros aren't tunes you would normally hear at a rock concert, let alone played by members of bands such as Arcade Fire and Yeah Yeah Yeahs. But that's exactly what happens at shows by the Sway Machinery, a New York all-star outfit led by guitarist and singer Jeremiah Lockwood.

Since 2006, the Sway Machinery has become a word-of-mouth sensation. Though they have been featured in the Village Voice and on National Public Radio, their reputation has been built on a series of passionate, high-intensity live performances.

Now the work of Lockwood and company is reaching a wider audience through their first full-length release, Hidden Melodies Revealed.

"I think for most people this music is obscure to the point of being a great big question mark, so the idea is to do something to expose the larger world to the cantorial tradition. And also the idea of music as knowledge, as information and a kind of storytelling," Lockwood said of the album's title and artistic philosophy.

Hidden Melodies Revealed is the culmination of a project first unveiled at a groundbreaking 2007 Rosh Hashanah show in the gothic precincts of the Angel Orensanz Foundation, formerly the Anshe Chesed Synagogue of Manhattan's Lower East Side.

After being developed through a series of live performances, the album was recorded in 2008 at Quebec's Petite Église, a private studio converted from a church by Montreal-based band Arcade Fire.

"It's a great space, it's a big space, it's an isolated space, and it just seemed to make sense," said saxophonist Colin Stetson, who plays with Arcade Fire and the Sway Machinery.

At the heart of the Sway Machinery's music are Lockwood's renditions of traditional prayers, delivered in his yearning intonation, along with original compositions and spoken word interludes.

A whole raft of other sounds and musical influences accompany Lockwood's idiosyncratic vocals. Instead of a bass guitar, the Sway Machinery relies on Stetson's bass saxophone, a feature that helps give the band its signature sound.

"In order for me to supply what's necessary as a bass player, it takes a whole lot of sweat and blowing, so it's visually a big difference. But then it also sounds slightly different than just a straight bass, it has an edge to it and cuts through," Stetson said.

The raunchy blues of Lockwood's Fender Telecaster and the world-beat drumming of Yeah Yeah Yeahs' percussionist Brian Chase also add additional dimensions to the music. And to top it off, the band also features Antibalas Afrobeat Orchestra's Stuart Bogie and Jordan MacLean on tenor sax and trumpet.

Lockwood, who also plays with the genre-bending band Balkan Beat Box, has a long history of mixing and matching various strains of archaic music.

His grandfather, Jacob Konigsberg, was a famous cantor, and Lockwood recalls spending hours at his house listening to records.

"It's obviously about the music, but also about our personal relationship, my grandfather's amazingly warm personality. I spent a lot of time with him and I imbibed a lot from him – his way of thinking about the world, his esthetic approach," Lockwood said.

Lockwood's father, Larry Lockwood, is a well-respected composer, whose use of folk songs in contemporary musical settings greatly influenced his son's musical ideas and development.

But Lockwood has not hesitated to go outside of the family for mentorship and instruction. As a teenager, he fell in love with the blues and by 13, he took to playing on the streets and subways of New York.

"In New York, playing on the streets and the subway is part of the life of the city, and there's a lot of great musicians out there. It's a very special venue for performance. You're out there in the world, and there's an intense physical energy to pull people in from whatever they're doing," he said.

It was there that he met veteran Piedmont bluesman Carolina Slim, who would become a lasting teacher and influence.

"The blues and the cantorial music traditions share the feeling that they come from an unknown world," Lockwood said.

"Carolina Slim was a great artist and saw himself as being a preserver of the musical tradition he grew up with, and that stuck with me. He was also very idiosyncratic in that country blues style, where there's never any sticking to a formula," he added.

All of these influences come together in the music of the Sway Machinery. Despite its disparate elements, the band is more than a random assortment of styles. Rather, all of the different ingredients combine to form one passionate, soul-consuming whole.

According to Lockwood, the mystical and spiritual nature of the music is reflected by the name of the band.

"You have the image of the body moving in prayer, but it's also like we're machines formed by the divine intellect and what we're doing is finding a way to do it automatically, so that we can't control what we do, accessing the music on a primal level," he said.

The music's involuntary nature comes through most clearly on I Shall Chant Praise, a track in which Lockwood scat sings in a way that can only be characterized as speaking in tongues.

Given its unusual influences and origins, it's no surprise that Hidden Melodies Revealed is one of the most original and unusual Jewish music albums to be released in recent memory.

Though the innovative musical settings of the Sway Machinery are different than anything you're likely to hear in synagogue, both the majesty and the intimacy of the ancient texts remain.

Hidden Melodies Revealed is available from the JDUB Records store at http://store.jdubrecords.org.

Dancer makes history at Royal Winnipeg Ballet

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

Maureya Lebowitz is the youngest dancer in the history of the Royal Winnipeg Ballet to perform the role of Juliet.

The 18-year-old danced the role in the Royal Winnipeg's production of Romeo and Juliet last month, during her debut season with the company.

Earlier this season, as part of the ballet's touring company, she danced the role of Wendy in Peter Pan, for which she got strong reviews in Winnipeg and Ottawa. She was an apprentice with the company last season Lebowitz is the daughter of Gary and Beth Lebowitz of Darby, Mont. Her parents are originally from Minnesota – her dad is from Minneapolis and her mon from Hibbing (the hometown of Bob Dylan, to whom she is related).

Her parents were living in California but moved to Darby – about a two-hour drive from Missoula, eastern Montana's largest community – because they felt that it would be a better place to raise children, Lebowitz said.

"Darby was a great place to grow up," she said. "Living in the mountains, we learned to appreciate nature. We went horseback riding and learned downhill skiing. People are very friendly there."

Lebowitz has been dancing all of her young life. She remembers she loved twirling around in her special white Shabbat dress. "I loved the flow of the fabric," she said.

She began dance lessons at the age of three. She used to commute the two hours to Missoula for lessons. She came to Winnipeg to train at the Royal Winnipeg Ballet School when she was 11.

"I enjoy being in Winnipeg," she said. "I love living in the Exchange District close to the theatres and great restaurants."

In her apprentice year with the company, she danced in Sleeping Beauty, The Nutcracker and Carmina Burana, and in a tribute to famed dancer and choreographer George Balanchine.

Dancing, she said, is a full-time job. "We practise from 9:30 to 6 five days a week."

When the time comes to go on stage, she said she focuses all of her attention on the role. While dancing is physically very demanding, she works hard at it, to keep growing emotionally and physically as an artist.

"Hopefully, there will be many more dramatic roles in my future," she said.

Lebowitz is looking forward to visiting Israel for the first time this summer. She has recently been accepted into the Birthright Israel program and is excited about going.

"My brother, Aaron, lived in Israel for a year," she says. "I am looking forward to visiting family in Jerusalem."

The King and the Jester explores human tragedy and fear that pervaded the Lodz Ghetto

The King and the Jester: The Story of the Lodz Ghetto (Tuesday, April 21 at noon at the Al Green Theatre), by Yossi Godard, explores the depths of a human tragedy through period photographs, old movie footage, re-enactments, animation and readings from diaries.

The ghetto, the last in Nazi-occupied Poland to be liquidated, was a case study in self-preservation. The Jewish "elder" appointed by the Germans to manage its affairs, Chaim Rumkowski, believed that he could save its 160,000 inhabitants if only they produced enough goods for the Wehrmacht. To a certain point, he was right. Ultimately, he was wrong, since Nazi racial hatred trumped war production.

Godard mocks Rumkowski through the medium of a ghetto street singer named Yankele Herszkowicz, whose bitterly ironic songs deflate him. "Rumkowski is great," he croons. "So why is everyone sighing?"

As a cinematic document of despair, The King and the Jester chronicles the desperation, the hunger, the deprivation and the fear that pervaded the ghetto.

It is followed by Dorit Starik's short documentary, Transport 2-8-2, which revolves around a remarkable but little-known footnote of the Holocaust.

In 1944, Germany traded 282 Jews destined for the gas chambers for German Templers in Palestine. The exchange, which was completed with the arrival of the Jews at Rosh Hanikra, was almost torpedoed by Britain and the Mufti of Jerusalem.

Replete with interviews with Jews and Germans, the film spends far too little time in explaining the lives and philosophy of the Templers.

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival runs April 18 to 26. For tickets and info visit www.tjff.com.

Being Jewish in France deals with, among other topics, the anti-Semitic Vichy period, when Jews were forced to wear the dreaded yellow star

Israel & the Jewish World

ENVIRONMENTAL ACTIVISM IN ISRAEL: The Jewish National Fund recently sent a group of Grade 10 students from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto on a mission to Israel, where the students learned about the JNF's contribution to the country's development, and in particular, how it tries to find solutions to environmental problems. The students are seen at the Bahan water reservoir in Emek Hefer near Netanya, where they were told how water purification initiatives can be used as part of the foundation for partnerships between Arabs and Israelis. Josh Tordjman makes his NHL debut

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Montreal native Josh Tordjman made history last month when he laid claim to being the first Sephardi Jew to play in the National Hockey League.

Tordjman, 24, was the goaltender for the Phoenix Coyotes in two away games, on March 8 against the New York Islanders and March 12 against the New Jersey Devils.

Both were losses for the Coyotes, who are just one spot away from the cellar in the Western Conference. Tordjman let in a total of eight goals, but made 54 saves during the two games.

Tordjman is no longer on the Coyotes' active roster and has returned to its Texas-based affiliate, the San Antonio Rampage of the American Hockey League, where he has played nearly four full seasons. He is their top goalie, and, in January, he was named the AHL's goaltender of the month. In 49 games with the Rampage, Tjordman has a team-best .912 save percentage and a 2.57 goals against average.

Tordjman, whose parents are of Moroccan origin, grew up in Kirkland.

His dad, Lucien Tordjman, was his first coach for several years after Josh began playing organized hockey at about 4-1/2 years old.

"We got the call late Saturday night [March 7] that Josh was going to play the next day [in New York] at 3 p.m. I said to my wife [Judy], we've got to go. I called my daughter, Julia, and my parents, who have also been following Josh's career and they wanted to go, too," Lucien Tordjman said.

"So, we got up at 3 a.m. that morning and all six of us, including Julia's fiancé, got in the car and drove down."

It was well worth it. The elder Tordjman describes seeing his son in an NHL net as a moment of indescribable pride.

Lucien Tordjman, who came to Canada at age two in 1957, was hooked on hockey by the age of five himself, and never missed a Saturday night NHL game. He also was a pretty good player, spending many an hour on the outdoor rink in Kent Park in Côte des Neiges when he was a youngster.

Josh began playing hockey as a defenceman because of his skills as a backward skater. "But by 6-1/2 or 7, all he wanted to do was stop the puck."

Lucien was coaching in Montreal's Lakeshore Hockey Association, but not goaltending. He educated himself in how to coach that position, reading what he could and watching videos.

Early on, he realized hockey was not just a passing fancy for Josh. The boy loved to play endlessly, and it was hard to get him off the ice during a practice.

His NHL debut was a big break for Tordjman, who signed as a free agent with the Coyotes in July, 2006. The team is coached by Wayne Gretzky. Tordjman was finally called up from San Antonio as a back-up goalie to Ilya Bryzgalov.

Tordjman, a Beaconsfield High School graduate, is 6-1 and a slight 157 pounds.

Prior to signing with the Coyotes, Tordjman spent four seasons in the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League with Victoriaville and Moncton. In 2006, he led the Moncton Wildcats to the league crown and then to the Memorial Cup finals, Canadian junior hockey's ultimate competition. Nevertheless, Tordjman was passed over in two NHL drafts.

He started his pro career with the Nashville Predators as a walk-on, leaving soon when the Coyotes offered him a contract.

His dad is confident that his son will be playing again in the NHL, if not this season. "He has a strong competitive character, he loves to play hard and to win, and he's a real team player. I love the way he is just so passionate about the game."

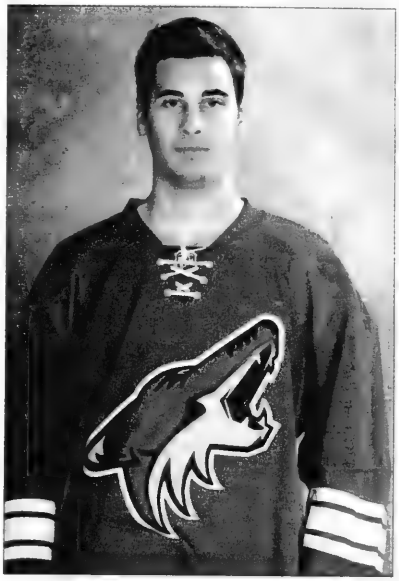
In other hockey news, veteran hockey journalist and author Gare Joyce writes a well-researched lengthy essay on forward Benjamin Rubin's sudden and until now unexplained departure from the Montreal Juniors, published on the website Sportsnet.ca.



Montrealer Josh Tordjman made his NHL debut last month with the Phoenix Coyotes.

Joyce's conclusion is that Rubin was treated shabbily and that what began as a Cinderella story, with a young Orthodox Jewish kid being given a break in hockey's big leagues, has ended sourly.

After a respectable start with the new QMJHL team in September, Rubin was demoted by the Juniors to the fourth line, and in January the 20-year-old forward was let go. He has been playing triple-A in St. Jérôme.

Joyce writes that Rubin, who is shomer Shabbat, didn't have so much as a ride when he was released, because it was a Saturday afternoon. He couldn't pay for a cab or even phone home.

After initially refusing to play on Shabbat when he broke into the QMJHL with the Quebec Remparts two years ago, Rubin received the go-ahead to do so from his father's rabbi, a Torah scholar who advised him that it would be OK to play on Shabbat, as long as he performed no other "work," including driving. He did continue to observe the High Holidays.

The Juniors club is owned by Farrell Miller.

Lieberman is dangerous

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

In times of upheaval – when we all begin to fear that the world no longer works the way we thought it did – we are prone to choose scary men as our protectors. Avigdor Lieberman is one of these scary men, and now he holds a frighteningly powerful position in one of the most vulnerable Israeli governments in the country's history. The fact that he will most probably gain more power and prominence in the coming months and years – unless the corruption charges currently being investigated by Israeli authorities stick – should make Israelis and Diaspora Jews worry.

New Views

Lieberman is a right-wing nut, a religious fanatic and an unabashed xenophobe whose political ideas could very well help to destroy Israel. Had it been accepted, his 2004 proposed plan to swap with the Palestinian Authority areas of Israel that are heavily populated by Arabs in exchange for sovereignty in the settlements would have been horribly injurious to the security of the Jewish state. Politically, the Lieberman Plan would have added fuel to the fire of "Israeli apartheid" activists, and militarily, it would have turned Israeli Arabs, most of whom pose no security threat to Israel at present, against the state.

Lieberman proposed to force Israeli citizens to pledge allegiance to their homeland at the risk of losing their voting privileges – a scheme, quite obviously, that's part of his larger plan to rid Israel of Arabs. But what about left-wing, fifth-generation Israelis – people who have sweated and fought for the Israel's survival, yet nonetheless, rightfully, have a problem with being forced to swear unequivocally to support every decision of the Israeli government? Would they also lose their right to vote?

The Lieberman Plan stinks no matter which way you answer that question. It puts a price on the kinds of freedom of thought, belief and expression that all humans should expect to receive for free. Israel is not Saudi Arabia or Cuba, places where one's ability to survive depends on saying the right thing to the right person at the right time. It is a democracy, where anyone can say anything at any time without fear of punishment. The Lieberman Plan suits the former category, not the latter.

At this dangerous time in the history of Israel and the Jewish people, Lieberman is the wrong kind of leader. When campuses around the world have become the main stage for anti-Zionists and anti-Semites trying to portray us as violent Muslim-haters (which most of us are not), a man who would evict Arabs from Israel must not be our mouthpiece. When the continued support of Israel's main allies is no longer a sure thing, we must put our best political foot forward and remind the world that our democracy in a sea of tyranny and religious hierarchy is worth preserving.

How is it that at a moment of great danger, Israelis have empowered a dangerous man? The answer, as it has been throughout history, is fear. When your enemies seem to be closing in, the most comforting words often harbour the most insular ideas. And this narrow-mindedness ultimately can bring tragedy.

The people of Israel did not vote in anywhere near majority numbers for Lieberman, yet he became a kingmaker in the recent election and is now one of the most powerful decision-makers in the government. This will not do. Israelis must show their inner strength and evict this dangerous man from the ranks of their leaders before he does the country any serious harm.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

THE SHAW STREET SHUL

B'nai Israel Congregation erected this synagogue 80 years ago, in 1929, on the east side of Shaw Street near Dundas Street, overlooking Bellwoods Park. Stars of David adorned both the exterior and interior of the building, which was designed by the Jewish architectural firm of Kaplan and Sprachman. Inset, a group of ba'alebatim, or synagogue elders, in the sanctuary. B'nai Israel sold the property around 1960, when the congregation merged with Beth David and moved to North York. The building is now a Catholic church adorned with crosses and statues of winged angels.

Sadness and celebration in the Jewish calendar

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Every year, after Pesach is over, I reflect on the eight days, and I'm always stunned that we were slaves in Egypt. I then look ahead to modern times, to Yom Hashoah, and am so deeply disturbed by the reality that six million of our people were murdered by other creations – hateful creations – of God. This reality is foreign to the lives that we live in Toronto in 2009.

URBAN WRITER

I continue to browse the Jewish calendar and focus on Yom Hazikaron, the day we remember fallen Israeli soldiers and victims of terror – Israel's Remembrance Day. I am again overwhelmed by our loss and the sacrifices that so many Jews and people have made to establish Israel and keep it alive.

When we look closely at the Jewish calendar and the moments we commemorate and celebrate, past the ritual and (sometime) fanfare, we are able to see millions of Jews who were brave and righteous, who walked the walk of being Jewish.

When you really look at those dates in history, you will see the faces of small children who scurried over the walls of the Kovno Ghetto in the dark of night to find some food for their families suffering inside those fortifications. You will see parents fearfully waiting for their valiant and precious little progeny to return.

Look intently at the months and years of the calendar and gaze upon the face of Simcha Frumkin, who was only 11 years old when he was forced along with his mother and father into that ghetto. For three years, he lived in that horrible place, until he and his family were transferred to Dachau in 1944. His father died there. At age 14, he was liberated.

This is our calendar. It's so painful to look at it. We remember Simcha's father.

Then we look again, over the horizon, past the blood-soaked earth of Europe, at a small patch of land – Israel – that we settled because of our bravery and tenacity, and because of a promise from God: "So the Lord gave Israel all the land he had sworn" (Joshua 21:43-45).

There we see women bearing children, working the fields and fighting alongside men to ensure that our side of the promise is kept – keeping a watchful eye over this holy land and protecting us from any future Kovnos or Crusades.

We look closer, past the numbers on the calendar, at the faces of those women. We see Batsheva Unterman unbuckling her five-month-old baby from a car seat and passing her out the window to safety, only to be crushed to death by a bulldozer driven by a maniacal terrorist in the streets of Jerusalem.

So much of the Jewish calendar is dotted blood red. For incomprehensible reasons, many people hate us, so much so that they're willing to kill our children.

Those who hate us, however, are not the ones we see when we study our history and commemorate the dates that are highly significant to our people.

No, the beauty of the Jewish way is that we do our best to see past the murderer with axe in hand and instead set our eyes upon the beautiful faces of our ancestors – our predecessors, our brothers and sisters in Israel – who died because they were Jews, because they were warriors reminding us that to be Jewish is to be strong, prepared and courageous.

On Yom Hashoah and Yom Hazikaron, remember them and strengthen yourself as a Jew so that our people can be safe everywhere and be able to practise our religion freely. Remember those who are in anguish today, Jew and non-Jew, for we are all creations of God. Be an active Jew!

Western countries boycott Durban II

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

GENEVA — Dozens of western representatives at the UN-sponsored conference against racism walked out during Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's address to the forum on Monday.

The diplomats rose from their chairs and walked out of the hall in Geneva as Ahmadinejad launched a tirade against the Israeli government. The Iranian leader also blasted the United States for its invasion of Iraq.

The move by western delegates followed announcements from a number of other democracies that they would not attend the review conference, known as Durban II. In January 2008, Canada became the first country to announce it would boycott the event, citing concerns it would turn into a replay of the hatred and bigotry demonstrated at the first UN anti-racism conference held in Durban, South Africa, in 2001, and would promote racism and intolerance, not oppose it.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Israel later announced it would not attend, and in the days before the Durban Review Conference began, the United States, Italy, Holland, Germany, Poland, Australia and New Zealand followed suit.

France said Monday its ambassador to Geneva would attend but would walk out immediately if the conference turned into a platform for racist comments against Israel. Britain and the Czech Republic had earlier said they would take part in the conference, but without a high-level official.

Ahmadinejad was the only head of state to participate in the conference, and he began with a speech that seemed to give credibility to concerns the conference would focus on vilifying the Jewish state.

He branded Israel a "racist government" and accused it of "being the most cruel and racist regime," sparking the walkout by angry western diplomats at the conference and protests from others.

In a rambling speech, Ahmadinejad also pointed a finger at the United States, Europe and Israel and said they were "destabilizing the entire world."

JERUSALEM — If not for the Holocaust, there would be as many as 32 million Jews worldwide, instead of the current 13 million, demographer Sergio Della Pergola has written in a soon-to-be published article.

Della Pergola, who holds the Shlomo Argov Chair in Israel-Diaspora relations and is director of the division of Jewish demography and statistics at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, tries to estimate the demographic damage of the Holocaust to world Jewry.

The Holocaust "struck a mortal blow particularly at the Jews of eastern Europe because of their especially young age structure," and particularly the number of children, he writes. This led to significant long-term demographic damage.

"The quantitative ramifications are far beyond what we think," he adds.

In the article, to be published in Beshvil Hazikaron, the periodical of the Yad Vashem Holocaust commemoration authority's School of Holocaust Studies,

The News in Brief

Canada

Street Named For Ed

TORONTO — Toronto Mayor David Miller last week named a portion of Duncan Street in the city's theatre district for legendary businessman and theatre impresario Ed Mirvish. The April 15 ceremony honoured Mirvish, who owned Honest Ed's department store as well as the Royal Alexandra and Princess of Wales theatres. Mirvish died in July 2007 at age 92.

Graffiti Found

TORONTO — Anti-Semitic messages were discovered at a Pickering, Ont., public school on Easter Sunday. The messages "We hate Jews," "I love Hitler" and "Die Jews" were found on the exterior playground walls of Highbush Public School on April 12, Sun Media reported. Durham Regional Police are investigating. Local residents believe the daubings, apparently made on the weekend, were unrelated to Passover.

Prof Blames 'Lobby'

OTTAWA — A tenured University of Ottawa physics professor who was fired for giving an entire fourth-year class A+ grades in a course has blamed the Israel lobby for his dismissal. In a written response to his March 31 firing, the self-described anarchist – who had taught for 20 years at U of O and has a history of criticizing Israel's treatment of the Palestinians – said that "the university decision to dismiss me was itself tainted with Israel-aligned political influence." The university has refused further comment on the case, saying it could end up in arbitration.

Comic To Be Tried For Anti-Semitism

PARIS — A controversial French comedian will be prosecuted on charges of anti-Semitism.

Dieudonne Mbala Mbala will go on trial May 5 in Paris for bestowing a bogus prize on a notorious Holocaust denier, Robert Faurisson, in a Dec. 2 performance for an audience of 5,000 near Paris. If convicted, the 42-year-old comedian faces a maximum fine of nearly $30,000, the French news agency AFP reported.

Dieudonne, as he is known, has been barred from performing in most French cities since the December stand-up routine in which an actor dressed as a Jewish Nazi camp prisoner awarded Faurisson a prize for "unrespectability and insolence."

Jean-Marie Le Pen, the leader of the far-right National Front political party who recently called Nazi gas chambers a historical "detail," sat among thousands of spectators who cheered and laughed when Faurisson made his surprise stage debut alongside Dieudonne.

Dieudonne has announced his intention to run for the European Parliament on an "anti-Zionist" ticket that groups far left and far right political parties. The vote is slated for June 7. Dieudonne, who is black, has been charged with racism and anti-Semitism in the past, including in Quebec, for remarks comparing Jews to "slave traders" and belittling the Holocaust.

World

Coleman To Appeal

MINNEAPOLIS — Norm Coleman will appeal a three-judge panel's ruling that former Saturday Night Live comedian Al Franken won Minnesota's election for U.S. Senate. A lawyer for Republican Coleman said April 14 the incumbent senator will appeal the ruling to Minnesota's Supreme Court. The panel ruled that Democrat Franken won a 312-vote victory and rejected Coleman's arguments that errors or irregularities in the vote counting violated equal protection standards.

Jew 'Crucified'

MANILA — A Jewish comedian from Australia had himself crucified in the Philippines on Good Friday for a new show. John Safran, 36, a TV personality in Australia known for staging outlandish stunts, was one of several people who chose to be nailed to a cross near Manila to symbolize Jesus' suffering on Easter, AFP reported. Safran, a graduate of an Orthodox boys-only school in Melbourne, was naked from the waist up and wearing a long-haired wig, and was heard moaning as nails were hammered through his skin into the giant cross. Safran was rushed to a medical tent afterward. The stunt was for a show titled John Safran's Race Relations, which Kim Dalton, director of the Australian Broadcasting Corporation, said was a "thoughtful and challenging exploration of cultural differences and convictions."

Demjanjuk Stays

CLEVELAND — Ex-Nazi guard John Demjanjuk returned to his home several hours after immigration agents removed him for deportation to Germany. An appeals court in Cincinnati blocked his deportation on April 14. Demjanjuk, 89, must now prove his deportation would amount to torture due to his many illnesses. Family members said they were caught unaware April 14 when agents carried the former death camp guard from his suburban Cleveland home. Germany wants him extradited on charges related to the deaths of 29,000 Jews. An Israeli court convicted him in 1988 of being the ruthless "Ivan the Terrible" at Treblinka. But Israel's Supreme Court dismissed the charges and freed him in 1993 because he couldn't be positively identified. That ruling upheld evidence he had been a guard at another death camp, Sobibor, but said he had served time for that crime waiting out the other charges. He returned to Cleveland and U.S. courts stripped him of his citizenship for lying about being a death camp guard.

Time Change Sought

NEW YORK — The New York Jets want the National Football League to change the time of one of two home games scheduled on the High Holidays. In a letter to commissioner Roger Goodell, owner Woody Johnson proposed a game at 4:15 on Sept. 27 be moved to 1 p.m. so Jewish fans can arrive home before Yom Kippur begins at sundown. The Jets' home game on Sept. 20, falls on the second day of Rosh Hashanah. The Jets reportedly believed it was understood that a New York team wouldn't play at home for two weeks straight during the High Holidays.

CJC Quebec gets new name despite opposition

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Despite the outcry of opposition, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is not going to reconsider its decision to rename its Quebec branch, the organization's chief executive officer says.

Toronto-based Bernie Farber said all CJC bylaws and protocols were followed before the decision was made to rename the Quebec region Congrès juif québécois, Section du Congrès juif canadien, or, in English, Quebec Jewish Congress, a Division of Canadian Jewish Congress.

The issue was discussed, after being formally proposed in January, and then adopted unanimously by the regional board of directors on March 18 and, with the exception of one dissenter, adopted by the national board on March 22.

He said the regional board, which has about 18 members, is composed of Quebec Jews from a range of backgrounds and is representative of the community. The national board of about 40 members includes Quebecers as well. Neither of those bodies was at full complement when the votes were taken. However, no wider consultation in the community is required by CJC's constitution.

"I think everyone should just take a deep breath and look at what really happened. The change is not as spectacular as some are making out; this is a change of emphasis… We are not taking anything away from the [division's] Canadianism."

The wisdom of the decision, he believes, will be proven over time, no matter which party is in power in Quebec.

Quebec, he insisted, is not a province like Ontario or Alberta, a fact that has been recognized, even by the federal government when Prime Minister Stephen Harper declared that the Québécois people are a nation.

Farber emphasized that the name will better equip CJC to advocate on behalf of the Quebec Jewish community. It will now be able to do so "in a way that emphasizes Quebec, without losing its connection to Canada."

He noted that CJC's Atlantic branch has always been known as the Atlantic Jewish Council.

Farber said the rebranding has actually been under consideration for some years.

He denied, contrary to what one media outlet reported, there was ever any plan to announce the new name on June 24, Quebec's Fête nationale, with it coming into effect on July 1, Canada Day.

The name change was to have become official at CJC's national plenary assembly that will take place May 31 in Toronto, Farber said. It was moved up after regional chair Victor Goldbloom mentioned the upcoming change at an interfaith model seder held in Ste. Agathe in March.

HEROES LIKE VLADIMIR PAID THE PRICE FOR ISRAEL'S FREEDOM

As we celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut, the miraculous founding of the State of Israel, we have so much to be proud of — Israel's extraordinary accomplishments, the courage and bravery of its people, as well as their fortitude and determination.

Today in Israel, there are over 51,000 disabled veterans and victims of terror who have sacrificed their bodies and souls defending our Jewish homeland. Vladimir Tokarev is one such young man who was critically wounded in battle.

An only child, Vladimir was born in Siberia and made Aliyah without his parents at age 15. "My choice of Israel was motivated by Zionism," he says. In Russia, he had been a long-distance competitive ice skater. When Vladimir came to Israel, he continued training. He could have accepted the status of "Only Son" or "Excelling Athlete" and been given a safe job in the army. Instead, Vladimir chose to serve in a combat unit as a paratrooper.

He was called up to defend Israel in the Second Lebanon War (2006) and went with pride, despite being "scared to death." In battle, Vladimir was hit by a missile that landed just a metre away from him. His arm was crushed. Shrapnel penetrated his lower back and tore the width of his intestines. He underwent hours of surgery to repair his wounds and spent many months in the hospital.

Once discharged, Vladimir began his long road to recovery and started his therapeutic treatments at Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv. In addition to the physical injuries, he suffers from post-traumatic stress syndrome and recurring nightmares of this horrific encounter. Rebuilding his life has not been easy.

Vladimir's sheer determination, along with the help, understanding, and support of the Beit Halochem staff have enabled him to rehabilitate. He is now studying, while still continuing his therapy and activities at Beit Halochem.

PLEASE ASSIST the more than 51,000 disabled war veterans and victims of terror, who turn to Beit Halochem to help them in their REHABILITATION.

May his memory be for blessing

From the editor's desk...

Last week, our friend and colleague Alek Silver passed away. He was 84. (Please see the obituary on page 7.)

Alek was the editor of The CJN's Yiddish Vinkel (Yiddish Corner) for nearly a decade, co-ordinating or writing the column that was, for many of our readers, a twice-monthly visit to a home, a culture and way of life that lives on mostly in memory.

There still remain, of course, enclaves throughout the Jewish world where Yiddish is spoken; for example, in haredi communities, as academic pursuits in some classrooms at some universities and among the aging remnant who survived the destruction of European Jewry.

But as the colourful, vibrant thoroughfare of everyday life in which individuals conduct their personal affairs – buy their bread, instruct their children, read weather maps, break their heads understanding manuals to construct a baby's crib, write love songs – it no longer exists.

Alek Silver lived and travelled on that thoroughfare.

He was born and raised in the town of Stopnitz, Poland, and survived the war that most of the people he loved did not.

In Canada, he worked as a typesetter in the realm of words, sentences, books and fresh ink that he loved.

Like so many of his peers, he was an autodidact who taught himself the content and the nuance of the authors, writers, thinkers and poets who comprised Yiddish culture.

It is true, of course, that he was a Yiddishist, but not in the way that the term was intended by some or understood by others, namely, as a way to champion and foster an entirely secular approach to Jewish life, devoid of reference to or reverence for God.

Alek loved Yiddish for its own sake, as the living language of a unique people communicating to their unique God in their own unique ways. I saw him in synagogue most Sabbaths, and we would greet each other with an embrace and the shrug so typical of the self-deprecating Yiddish manner.

"How are you, my friend," I would ask, hopeful that he was well.

"Thank God," he would answer with a smile. "It could always be worse," he would add with a shrug.

Simcha Simchovitch, the octogenarian Yiddish poet and writer whose essay on A.M. Klein appeared in the April 8 issue of The CJN, recalled Alek as a "great activist on behalf of Yiddish." Alek designed, typeset and printed many of Simchovitch's books.

"He knew Yiddish very well. His death is a great loss."

Alek was a man of tender ways and gentle disposition. At his funeral, Rabbi Wayne Allen correctly noted that "Alek lived his life in hope and optimism. He let the better angels of his nature come shining through. He affirmed the positive worth of life."

He did not romanticize Jewish life in Europe before the war. He simply let the language of his youth and, in truth, of his soul, tell the story of that life.

His last column in the paper appeared two weeks ago, April 8. He recorded some thoughts in honour of Pesach. The column was entitled Mayn Zaydyn's Afikoman (My grandfather's afikoman). I excerpt a small portion of it for our non-Yiddish speaking readers, freely though not expertly translated into English. Perhaps they will be able to sense for themselves how he could so lovingly convey so much emotion with the compact, understated, onomatopoeic, conjoined words of Yiddish.

"My zaide was not a very wealthy man, but by the same token, no one could say that he was a poor man. Along with my bubbe Pes'l, of blessed memory, he conducted a lovely Jewish home according to the laws of Moses and Israel. Some time later, when I grew up and a little bit taller, I learned about some of the traditions that my grandfather held by.

"On the wall in my grandmother's kitchen, on a small nail in the wall, there hung a small round piece of matzah. I still remember that the matzahs in the little shtetl were made by hand. They were thicker than today's matzahs and there were little valleys and tiny mountains on them. When one of them became a little bit burned, it looked like black on white malaria. That's how the little round piece of matzah appeared to me, which in my younger years, I did not quite understand...

"What became of the last afikoman? I don't know. I wasn't there at the end. But I can well imagine what happened in their last moments. My grandmother Pes'l, with a great sense of purpose, removed the malarial piece of matzah from the wall and gave it to my grandfather Reb Mordechai Leib to hide somewhere. My grandfather took this last afikoman, kissed it and placed it in the side pocket of his jacket. He then patted the pocket and said: 'Pes'l, it's time to go.'

"They went outside... where they joined the few who remained from the Jews of the 'small ghetto.' Under the smashing heel of the Nazis' jackboots and the Nazis' wild screams, they went on their last way. The afikoman went with, and along with my grandparents, disappeared forever."

Alek Silver was an exemplar for all that was gentle and good and warm in the Yiddish world of our parents and grandparents. Thank you, Alek.

Your memory will always be for blessing. –MBD

MIMOUNA CELEBRATION

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his wife, Sarah, exchange a few words at a traditional Mimouna celebration in the northern city of Or Akiva, following the conclusion of Pesach. It has become a tradition that leading government personalities are hosted at Mimouna celebrations in Israel. The traditional feast is observed by Jews from North Africa, although today Mimouna has become popular with many Israelis who don't necessarily have a strong connection with former North Africa communities. NGO works to empower Ethiopian Israeli community

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Yuvi Tashome can't say with absolute certainty that the organization she co-founded to help the Ethiopian community is solely responsible, but she has been told that four years ago Magen David Adom used to receive two calls a day to send ambulances to Gedera because of violence, including stabbings – and today that number is down to zero.

"We were amazed," Tashome told The CJN in a Passover interview, when she was here at the invitation of the New Israel Fund of Canada (NIFC), which funds her organization, to speak to 125 people at a "liberation seder" at Beth Tzedec Congregation (co-sponsored by NIFC) about her journey to Israel and the work she does today.

The 32-year-old director of Friends by Nature – a non-governmental organization she started with eight people – left Ethiopia at age 6 and immigrated to Israel with her family as part of Operation Moses after walking through the Sudanese desert.

Friends by Nature is committed to long-term work that empowers Ethiopian youth at risk and their families in Gedera, which has an Ethiopian Jewish population of 1,700.

"We wanted to do deep work with the Ethiopian community," said Tashome, who has a degree in education and Israeli studies from Ashkelon College, a satellite of Bar-Ilan University. "We knew something was wrong with the way the [existing] programs were helping them. We thought that one of the problems was that everything is a project for one, two or three years, and then it's over."

As well, she added, programs she was familiar with had originated outside the Ethiopian community and had no Ethiopians in managerial positions.

Before co-founding the new group four years ago, Tashome ran a program that facilitated hikes for young people from grades 7 through 12, and opened dialogue about Ethiopia and Israel. "It was good, but not good enough," she said.

Among the issues facing the Ethiopian Israeli community are poor school attendance, drug and alcohol abuse, and run-ins with police among youth, who make up more than half the Ethiopian population in Gedera.

Tashome believes a major problem is that many Ethiopian Israeli young people "haven't found themselves" as Ethiopians or Israelis.

"They don't belong anywhere." Those born in Israel "don't know anything about their parents being powerful. They only know the weakness of their parents."

Tashome's story is different. Her mother, who was widowed in Ethiopia and remarried another Ethiopian in Israel, "did a lot of things that were the exception," Tashome said. She ran an NGO for children in Ashkelon, told Ethiopian stories to kindergarten students as a volunteer, and is now studying for a degree.

As a child growing up in Ashkelon and other cities, Tashome did her homework at programs that were run for Ethiopian youth.

"Nothing really happened in the house, and the message of that was that your family is not good enough," she said.

But when youngsters feel comfortable bringing their friends home, it keeps them off the streets, she explained.

One of the programs she runs now is called Homework at Home. "It's a funny name, because homework is supposed to be at home," Tashome said. "Other programs take them out of the house."

Ethiopian youngsters may find it difficult to do homework at home because of the number of siblings in the house, lack of quiet, and lack of a computer and proper table, Tashome said.

As part of the program, teachers visit the home on a weekly basis to work with small groups of children. "After a while you see the mother and father have their motivation. They turn off the TV, take the [younger] kids to another room."

Some families, after time in the program, have decided to buy computers or change the lighting to make it more conducive to doing homework.

Friends by Nature has also run hiking programs for young people and their parents. "During the trip, [young people] see that the parents know so much about things that grow in Israel and what you can do with them. It's the first time they know that their parents know something that is relevant to Israeli life." Often it is a springboard for further parent-child discussion, she explained.

As well, Friends by Nature has a volunteer program for young adults who have finished their army service. Participants identify needs in the community, plan and implement solutions, and are also taken to tour Israeli universities with an eye to their own future plans.

They become role models for younger Ethiopians, Tashome said. "It's about empowerment."

The changes Tashome's group is working toward seem to help Ethiopian youth integrate better into the larger Israeli society, she notes.

"We noticed that if you know more about your Ethiopian culture, Ethiopian masoret [tradition], and have experience of your parents with knowledge and power, then... that gives the kids self-confidence to have friends who are not Ethiopian."

For Tashome – whose husband, a seventh-generation Israeli, is also a co-founder of Friends by Nature – her work has become even more personally motivated in the last few years.

As the mother of a three-year-old, who is expecting her second child in September, Tashome said, "What we're trying to do is to live in the neighbourhood for a lifetime, raising our kids there. The motivation is very personal. It's for my kids, so I'm working hard."

Obituary

CJN columnist saw the good in the world

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Family and friends remember Alek Silver, who died April 13 at age 84, as an optimist who always saw the good in the world.

Alek Silver

As a Holocaust survivor, he lived through a nightmare, but it did not shape his life. "He did not let the horrific experience turn him into an unhappy soul," said Rabbi Wayne Allen in a eulogy at Silver's funeral.

Rabbi Allen related a story from the Talmud about two boys who enter a rose garden. "One complained about the thorns and thistles, and the other called it a wonderful and beautiful place.

"There are two kinds of people – those who see the world through hurt and pain, and those who recognize the dangers and obstacles and are saddened by it, but [still see the beauty].

"Alek did not ignore the pain and suffering – he transcended it. He loved and lived and celebrated. His life was filled with meaning, despite the evil that was done to him."

A typesetter by profession – he was the longtime owner of Toronto Typesetting – Silver came to Canada with his parents and his sister, where he met his wife, Lesley, also a Holocaust survivor. They were married 55 years.

"He was pro-Israel, had tremendous faith and loved learning. He attended lectures almost every week and was always reading. He was attracted to anything that had to do with Judaism." Lesley Silver said.

His passion, she said, was writing and editing in Yiddish, and over the years he spent his free time editing a Yiddish bulletin out of Miami and writing for the Hebrew Journal. "People from Europe or the United States often sent him manuscripts to be edited or translated," she added

Since 2000, Silver wrote a Yiddish column twice a month for The CJN, in which he covered different aspects of Yiddish culture, often writing about poets and authors from past generations.

"He loved all of his writing. He wrote until the end," Lesley Silver said.

Paula, Silver's daughter, said despite a number of illnesses over the years, her father "just kept going and going. Nothing slowed him down.

"He always told us how thankful he was to be here, and he was happy to take care of his family, [be with his] friends, and work on his writing and editing."

Silver leaves his wife Lesley, daughters Paula and Michelle, sons-in-law Peter and Ian, three granddaughters, and his sister Helen.

BOWLEREINU FOR ZAREINU: More than 100 students from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Richmond Hill campus participated in the first Bowlereinu for Zareinu at Richmond Hill Pro Bowl on April 5. The event raised more than $16,000 for Zareinu Education Centre, a day school and treatment centre for children with physical and developmental challenges. Seen, from left, are Bowlereinu co-chairs Danna Zevy and Samantha Zevy, Zareinu events co-ordinator Shawna Samuel, and Bowlereinu co-chairs Arielle Zahavi, Lauren Moses and Eliana Goldberg.

Minimal starting point

The curtain went up last week on the new U.S. administration's first Mideast diplomatic presentation. The primary player was U.S. special envoy George Mitchell. He visited with some of the key leaders in the area, exchanged "frank" views with them in private, posed dutifully for photos with his brimming company and made pronouncements outlining the broad peace parameters envisioned by U.S. President Barack Obama.

What we saw was neither drama, nor comedy. At times it bordered on vaudeville, but deep within the unscripted scenes, we heard the soliloquys of tragedy.

At every turn, Mitchell reiterated the American government's committment to a two-state solution as the ultimate way to bring about peace between the Palestinians and the Israelis. There was nothing new in this. Indeed the majority of Israelis hold the same view.

In his meeting with Mitchell, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu suggested out loud, deliberately into the cameras and microphones, that Palestinians must recognize and accept Israel as a Jewish state.

The mere thought, however, of Israel as a Jewish state is anathema to the Palestinians. Palestinian Authority (PA) spokespeople immediately launched into a chorus of recriminations against the Israeli leader.

Chief PA negotiator Saeb Erekat said that the demand to recognize Israel as a Jewish state was "an admission by the Israeli prime minister that he cannot deliver on peace."

Azzam al-Ahmed, a senior Fatah official said, "We reject Netanyahu's demand to recognize Israel as a Jewish state. This demand illustrates the racist nature of Israel and the extremist policies of its government. It also shows that Israel is not serious about making peace with its neighbours."

Omar al-Ghul, an adviser to PA Prime Minister Salaam Fayad, said: "No Palestinian leader can ever accept this demand even if the whole world recognizes Israel as a Jewish state."

The question that begs to be asked is: Why?

Why if the solution to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict lies in a two-state answer cannot one of the two states be Jewish? What end result, exactly, do the Palestinians intend if neither of the two states can be for the Jewish people?

"I am prepared to negotiate with any side that desires to advance peace between Israel and the Palestinians," Netanyahu told reporters on the weekend in response to the accusation that his declaration was a pre-negotiation demand. "Contrary to reports, I don't condition dialogue with the Palestinians on recognition of Israel as a Jewish state. Nevertheless, progress in the peace process does depend on the willingness to recognize Israel as a Jewish state."

For those of us who believe that the Jewish people as well are entitled to live in their own sovereign state, Netanyahu's position is eminently reasonable. But more than that, it is surely an obvious, minimal starting point for an end result that envisions two states. We trust and hope that Mitchell and Obama agree that it is.

Israel might have to face "thousands of years of terrorism," despite the fact the PLO's terrorist infrastructure was destroyed in the 1982 Lebanon war, Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir warned in a Passover interview. Shamir said even if Israel made peace with all of its Arab neighbours, it could still face attacks from those that oppose its existence.

CJC Quebec region name change

Where do the Quebec regional officers get the idea that Quebec Jews would welcome the change to Congrès juif québécois, Section québécoise du Congrès juif canadien or, in English, Quebec Jewish Congress, the Quebec division of Canadian Jewish Congress ("CJC Quebec Region changes its name," CJN Montreal; "CJC changes its name in Quebec," CJN Toronto, April 8). Everyone I spoke to about it was ardently against the change. They feel they are Canadian Jews who happen to live in the province of Quebec. On April 2, there was a CTV poll on the plan and 89 per cent were against it. There is a hint of separatism in it.

Obscuring reality in the name of an idea

It is interesting how in the name of an idea one can obscure reality. "At least once in the national memory of a people, there has to be imprinted not just the historical reality of being liberated, but the constant idea that we are free. What God gave us at the Exodus was the possibility of ever-renewable freedom… The Exodus instructs us that all of life is a choice to be free," Elliott Melamet writes in his column "The Exodus gave us access to transcendence" (CJN, April 2).

If this was God's message, why then did the Almighty not protect the Jews but leave them to be "tortured and gassed and shot and exterminated… persecuted and harassed and exiled and ridiculed." Instead He "gave us the possibility of ever-renewable freedom." What is the use of the "constant idea that we are free" when in reality Jews were "tortured, gassed, exterminated"? To be free is not only an idea and a choice, but a struggle. Instead, the Jewish people were told to wait for the Messiah.

"That idea," Melamet writes, "represents our salvation." What about the six million Jews who believed in this idea and were exterminated? Had the Almighty sent several plagues to liberate the Jews from the death camps as he liberated Jews from slavery in Egypt, only then could Melamet declare that "that idea represents salvation."

Not in our name

How bizarre to think that the government of Israel, which is responsible for the safety and protection its citizens and residents, would even consider, let alone act "in the name" of those who protested under this unfortunately chosen banner ("Israel-bashing Jews: not in my name," CJN, March 5). Only egocentric people sitting in the comfort and safety of a home 6,000 miles from the possibility of having a Qassam rocket land on their children's daycare could conceive of such an idea. Hard to know whether to laugh or cry.

People want help with shivah protocol

Many thanks to Frances Kraft for her story describing what saying Kaddish for her father has meant to her and for her companion piece on shivah etiquette ("Thoughts on Kaddish, nine months in" and "Shivah dos and don'ts," CJN Toronto, April 8; CJN Montreal, April 17).

It seems the catalyst for the latter were requests from CJN readers. This strongly suggests people want and need help with shivah protocol, probably as shivah calls become more common for members of the postwar boomer generation. While most of us can navigate these situations by instinct, there are finer points of shivah dos and don'ts that may be unfamiliar. May I suggest that Jewish leaders offer public classes or discussion groups on this aspect of bereavement. It would be a mitzvah.

Columnist missed some Jews

In a valiant attempt to include every known Jewish organization and group, columnist Gerald Gall missed quite a few Jews ("Canada's Jewish communities," CJN, April 8). In Toronto, we have Darchei Noam, one of Canada's Reconstructionist congregations with approximately 250 families and growing. At Darchei Noam, there are at least two members who are neither Sephardi nor Ashkenazi, and I know of quite a few others whose ancestors never saw Spain or any part of Europe. They belong to yet a third group of Jews known as Mizrachi. The Mizrachi (a.k.a. Oriental Jews) are Jews from India, Morocco, Tunisia, Yemen, Syria, Iran, Iraq and Ethiopia. There is also Oraynu Congregation for humanist Judaism, which is part of the secular humanist Jewish movement.

U.S. should reject its role as 'Great Satan'

By KAMBIZ TAVANA
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Since taking office, U.S. President Barack Obama has given concrete signs that he's serious about engaging with Iran. And the Islamic Republic signalled back last week that it may be ready to do business.

Whatever the new U.S. approach to Iran may be, I propose that Obama keep the following points in mind. First, it would be a mistake to direct all efforts at Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, as if he makes all the important decisions. It's true that the Islamic Republic's constitution gives the supreme leader final word on all matters of state, but this is expressed more as a veto power than direct involvement in decision making.

When Iran had a reformist president – Mohammad Khatami – from 1997 to 2005, nuclear development was suspended for nearly two years, and the country co-operated closely with the United States on Afghanistan.

Khatami's successor, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, of course, has been far more hard-line and has proceeded full steam ahead on the nuclear program. But both men served under Khamenei, who, rather than rule by fiat, tries to build a consensus between different camps. When the supreme leader makes up his mind, it's usually in favour of the policy he thinks has a better chance of being sold to the largest public in Iran.

If the United States has any hope of budging Iran on the nuclear question, it must put itself in Iran's shoes. The need to develop a nuclear capability is something all Iranians agree on. It unites the people – and all the country's political parties – no less than the eight-year war with Iraq did.

A nuclear capability is not just a matter of national pride. It's seen as the ultimate defensive weapon. Iranians are convinced that a nuclear capability – and uranium enrichment may be sufficient here – is the best guarantee against regime change from outside. After all, the United States has invaded both Afghanistan and Iraq, and it's still deeply involved in both countries.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

If America wants to convince Iran to give up its nuclear aspirations, both its carrot and stick need to be massive. The latter would have to be painful and effective sanctions, by no means easy to implement. With or without sanctions, the Islamic Republic has long been good at getting what it needs on the black market, and this could include a nuclear warhead if deemed necessary. A massive carrot, meanwhile, would have to address not only Iran's security but also its economic needs.

We must remember that two political trends prevail in Iran. One, of course, is the trend that preaches hostility toward the United States. It requires the "Great Satan" in order to justify its own human rights breaches and its meddling in Lebanon, Syria, Iraq, Afghanistan and the Palestinian territories. This trend represents a minority view, but it's a very dangerous minority, controlling much of the country's resources and production, and also its armed forces and military industries.

In truth, it's not possible to make a deal with the extremists in Iran. This camp uses the conflict with the West, and especially Israel, to maintain its hold on power. Even if most Iranians want a deal with the United States, the extremists have the capacity to scuttle reconciliation. This could be done by, for example, taking American naval forces prisoner in the Persian Gulf and accusing them of trespassing.

At the same time, Iran's rational majority wants normal relations with the West and their country's return to the international community. Even if its leaders are not part of the state's inner circle, they have the support of most of the people. So any move toward reconciliation needs to strengthen the moderates who are already in good positions so they will have popular support to execute the plan.

Therefore, a new approach by the United States should be multilayered. First, it should improve the lives of ordinary Iranians. One incentive could be assistance to the country's civilian aviation industry, since sanctions on Iranian aviation are perceived as contributing to many fatal air crashes.

A dialogue could also connect the U.S. Congress to Iran's parliament, whose members are elected by popular vote – not always a fair vote, but the closest thing. These people reflect both Iran's reformists and conservatives. To be realistic, initial contacts might involve much shouting and finger-pointing, but that's the way to start.

The next step should be mutual access for the media of both countries. This would be especially important for Iranian journalists, who should have the chance to question United States officials and politicians. The press has always been skilled at bypassing censorship, and once talk about America is unencumbered in Iran, the Great Satan will be viewed as plain old America, familiar to people from their childhood because of superheroes such as Batman and Spiderman, and even Barbie.

After that, there should be educational exchanges, especially on legal issues – where the United States can be helpful in the training of human-rights lawyers – and joint cultural events in theatre, books and the arts.

Should America really do all this to win Iran back? One thing is certain: if the United States doesn't do it, no power in Iran can change the status quo. The Islamic Republic can't survive without the existence of the "Great Satan," which justifies its remaining in power to conduct its dirty little games.

Netanyahu should attack Iran

By YOSSI MELMAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

If I were Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's national security adviser, I would advise attacking Iran. It doesn't have to happen immediately. Although Iran has crossed the "technological threshold" and already has most of the know-how, equipment and materials to enable it to create a nuclear bomb, it will take another year at least, and maybe even three, to implement the potential and the capability it has accumulated.

In any case, Israel must wait in order to not disrupt U.S. President Barack Obama's strategy of talking to Iran, a strategy that is destined to fail.

These are the main considerations that should determine whether or not to attack:

1. Would nuclear weapons in Iranian hands really constitute a clear and present danger to the existence of Israel?

2. Does Israel have the intelligence and operational capability to enable it to strike hard at Iran's nuclear sites?

3. What damage would be caused to Israel by an Iranian response?

4. Would an Israeli attack harm vital U.S. interests?

5. How would the Arab world react to such an attack?

As an adviser, here are my answers.

1. It's not certain that nuclear bombs in Iranian hands would necessarily constitute an existential threat to Israel. The Gulf states, such as Bahrain, Saudi Arabia and Egypt, should be more afraid than Israel, and in fact they are extremely worried. It's also difficult to imagine that the ayatollahs would use nuclear weapons. Such a use would not only eradicate the nation being attacked, it would also destroy the regime of the religious leaders as well as the lives of millions of people in Iran. But Israel will still have difficulty trusting the rationalism of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad or Ayatollah Ali Khomanei.

2. Israel has the military ability to cause serious damage to the Iranian nuclear program, to hit the nerve centres of production: the uranium enrichment facility in Natanz, the uranium conversion facility in Isfahan and several additional sites where they are working on assembling the bomb. Such an attack would delay Iran's nuclear capability by several years, but would not destroy it entirely.

3. Iran has about 100 missiles that can reach Israel, and it would also activate Hezbollah and its terror networks worldwide. But in spite of its technological achievements, Iran is a backward country, burdened with problems of prostitution, drugs, poverty, ignorance and above all, corruption. It's doubtful whether a country that is riddled with rot is capable of maintaining a strong and efficient army. Iran is a paper tiger.

4. An attack that's not co-ordinated with Washington would cause a deep rift with the United States and lead to the imposition of harsh sanctions against Israel.

5. The Arab and Muslim world would condemn Israel.

Ostensibly, the obvious conclusion from these answers is that an attack against Iran is too great a gamble, one that Israel's leadership should not take. That is also the reigning opinion among senior members of the Obama administration – from Vice-President Joe Biden to Defence Secretary Robert Gates, who recently spoke on the subject – and most U.S. experts.

An exception to this group thinking can be found in words written recently by editor David Samuels in the online magazine Slate, in an article titled, "Why Israel will bomb Iran." The essence of his assumptions, which favour attack, are as follows: Israel's special status in the United States stems not only from common cultural values and the Christian belief in the Holy Land and from the memory of the horrors of the Holocaust, but also, and primarily, from Israel's image as the lone ranger who fights the bad guys in the Wild West of the Middle East, in order to defend its existence. Recently there have been cracks in this image due to what are seen as Israel's failures in the most recent campaigns against Hezbollah and Hamas. In Samuels' opinion, Israeli weakness is undermining strategic co-operation with the United States, while Iran is trying to achieve regional hegemony.

According to Samuels, while an Israeli attack may serve American interests, it will force the Obama administration to behave as though those interests have actually been harmed. The angry Arab and Muslim world will always suspect that Washington was a secret partner and gave Israel the green light to attack. In order to assuage Arab Muslim anger, the United States will have to force Israel to withdraw from the territories and enable the establishment of a Palestinian state.

Therefore, a good adviser must tell Netanyahu: don't wait until they force you to do something you don't want to do. Pre-empt it. An attack on Iran is a window of opportunity that could not only remove the nuclear threat, but also restore Israel's status as a regional superpower and its image as crazy and unpredictable, and a state that will stop at nothing.

The truth is that such an attack serves the interests of the United States, the West and the Arab world, but they would find it difficult to admit it and would be forced to respond harshly to an Israeli offensive. Therefore, if I were the national security adviser, I would explain to the prime minister that an attack alone, even if it succeeds, would not serve Israel's true national interests.

In order to implement a strategic breakthrough, the Israeli government will have to orchestrate a formative historic event. It must agree to the establishment of a Palestinian state and operate at a feverish pace to that end. In such a case, not only would the United States and the pro-Western Sunni Arab world accept the attack on their Shiite rival, they would even welcome it, thus making it possible to pave the way to more peace agreements with Arab nations, security arrangements and a strategic alliance based on common interests.

Opinions

The power of sacrifice

Each year, when the Torah reading approaches Vayikra, I struggle with Vayikra's focus on animal sacrifice. Contemporary consumers buy meat in groceries, never witnessing the slaughter of animals. The thought that this gory act is to be done in a sacred place seems bizarre to 21st-century minds. Many, uncertain in their understanding of Vayikra, take solace in Maimonides' controversial remarks considering animal sacrifice to be a concession to the cultural norms of the biblical period. If that's Maimonides' view, we think, it's not so bad if we can't understand sacrifices either.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

But discomfort with Vayikra goes beyond PETA-style concerns. In Vayikra, animal sacrifice serves as a proxy for ourselves. Each sacrifice is a replay of the drama of the Akedah, with the owner playing Isaac's role. This type of selfless devotion is foreign to a zeitgeist built around personal identity.

Identity reigns supreme. Our designer-made possessions reflect our "personal style," and we focus on self-esteem and self-confidence. Intertwined with our self-absorption is a materialism that is bonus-built, consumption-driven, and consumer-oriented. This is not a sacrifice-friendly culture.

However, sacrifice is an idea whose time has come. The outrage over executive bonuses shows the deep anger at the corporate world's sense of entitlement. There has been a realization that the economic crisis is not simply a failure of the financial system, but also a failure of character, a crisis brought on by the arrogance and greed of traders and bankers. Humility and selflessness, the core virtues of sacrifice, are the very things we so desperately lack.

The midrash says there is nothing more perfect for serving God than the humble, broken heart. A humble heart has remarkable spiritual powers. Its vision isn't clouded by ego, and its generosity isn't smothered by greed.

Seen this way, sacrifice isn't about destruction. On the contrary, sacrifice releases the power of a humble heart.

While the past year has produced more than its share of villains, there are quiet heroes as well. Chesley Sullenberger landed a full airplane without working engines in the Hudson River, saving 155 lives. Beyond Sullenberger's flying skills was a deep sense of dedication. He didn't leave the sinking plane until he had walked the entire cabin twice to verify everyone had left, and insisted that he be the last one to leave the life raft he was in.

Sullenberger's heroism reminds us of forgotten virtues. As we see how greed and grift have ravaged our economy, perhaps it's time to respect those who live lives of dedication. Perhaps it's time to remember the virtues of humility and generosity.

Perhaps it's time to remember the power of sacrifice.

Durban II: Let's turn a negative into a positive

An internet petition titled "Jewish Canadians Concerned about Suppression of Criticism of Israel," would be laughable if it was not so tragic and typical. Of all the modern ills to worry about, as Jews and as Canadians, this problem seems trivial. Especially following the Gaza operation, claiming that criticism of Israel is being suppressed is like claiming that Canadians don't talk enough about the weather.

Gil Troy in Montreal

These are boom times for Israel critics. Anti-Israel week has become a fixture on many campuses, perpetuating the libel that Israel's actions in defending itself in its nationalist conflict with Palestinians are comparable to South African racism. Year-round, Israel has become the left's favourite whipping boy, demonized in the sloppiest and most distorted of ways.

Self-righteous protesters, however, love feeling oppressed. No self-respecting Israel-bashers in North America want to admit that their position allies them with the world's dictators and anti-Semites, with evil Arab oil monarchs and genocidal Hamas terrorists, with nuclear-proliferating Iranian mullahs and racist, sexist, homophobes hostile to democracy, with right-wing neo-Nazis and left-wing purveyors of the "Zionism is racism" libel. So what better way to earn some radical street cred than to claim that evil forces are suppressing speech, resurrecting the anti-Communist excesses of the 1950s?

The petition is just one more example of these attacks' intensity and inaccuracy. "We do not believe that Israel acts in self-defence," these self-righteous scolds proclaim. This claim ignores more than 1,179 innocents (and counting) that Palestinian terrorists have murdered since Israel compromised during the Oslo peace process, the 10,000 Qassam rockets fired under the lovely auspices of Hamas, and the relentless attacks on bar mitzvahs and seders, cafes, university cafeterias, kindergartens and bars. This lie ignores the culture of peace Israel has created despite it all, and the pornographic culture of political violence that pollutes the Palestinian national movement. This distortion overlooks Israel's treaties with Egypt and Jordan, its concessions to Yasser Arafat and his Fatah movement in the 1990s, and Israel's voluntary withdrawal from Gaza less than four years ago.

To "back up" the claim, the petitioners assert that "Israel is the largest recipient of U.S. foreign aid, receiving $3 million a day." This lie, which some students parroted back to me recently, too, ignores the fact that since 2003, American foreign aid to Iraq has often dwarfed American foreign aid to all countries combined.

But why let facts get in the way of a popular talking point?

I don't fear these Israel-bashers and their treasured libel-Israel week. As a strong believer in free speech, I wouldn't do anything to prevent peaceful political activities on campus, no matter how absurd or intellectually dishonest. Petitions such as this only prove how jaundiced so many Israel critics are, whether they're Jewish or not. I trust the court of public opinion to reject these half-truths. I'm proud to see how Canadian public opinion has soured on the Palestinian case, appalled by the terrorism and frequently seeing through the victimization routine that avoids compromising to achieve pragmatic solutions.

My fear is that not enough of "us" – Jews and non-Jews who care about the truth, who resent the libels – are willing and able to refute these lies, to punch through the postures. With the world set to witness the followup to the 2001 UN anti-racism conference (held in Durban, South Africa), where pro-Palestinian forces will shift the focus from the serious challenge of fighting racism to trendy demonization of the Jewish state, let's learn from Jewish tradition to turn a negative into a positive. Every day that Durban II meets, let us have teach-ins about Israel and celebrations of Zionism. For each lie cast, let's try to plant some seeds of truth, ensuring that in the end, good will triumph.

Braided memories of the Holocaust

Shortly before his death, the Italian chemist and writer Primo Levi observed that the stories of the victims of the Holocaust, "those who did not return," can never be fully recovered. Levi acknowledges the limitations of the memories of survivors like himself who, while having suffered unspeakably in concentration camps, "never fathomed them to the bottom." But unwilling to consign the dead to oblivion, Levi understands that the living must "speak in their stead, by proxy."

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

When we gather as a community on Yom Hashoah to remember the Holocaust and to commemorate its victims, we take on Levi's mantle of memory by proxy. By now, of course, the majority of people at commemorative ceremonies have no personal memory of the Nazi genocide. Our remembrance draws on several memory strands: personal memory, familial memory, collective memory and historiography.

Personal memory draws on the recollections of survivors and other eyewitnesses. We are privileged to live among survivors of Nazi persecution who made their way to Canada. These personal memories, shared with one's intimate circle and sometimes with total strangers, open a portal to the past as nothing else can. Many survivors have made the painful journey backward into the past to write memoirs, record testimonies and craft creative works.

Familial memory builds on a mixture of stories, traditions and ways of being that are passed down from generation to generation, both consciously and unconsciously. Graphic artist Art Spiegelman, for example, recalls that when his mother would take him shopping as a little boy and he needed to find a washroom, she would tell him quite casually of the latrines at Auschwitz. One of my students told me she saw aspects of her father in a story our class was reading about a child survivor who, as an adult, kept purchasing properties in an impossible attempt to recover his lost home.

Collective memory is forged from the way that a community looks back at the past and understands its meaning. Even when time passes and the events recede into the distant past, they remain in living memory, relevant to the present. Like the story of Pesach, the way a society speaks about its past both reflects and affirms its sense of identity, values, and cohesion as a people.

These three ways of engaging the past – personal, familial and collective – have traditionally been seen as different from, and in opposition to, historiography, the writing of history. Relying on documentary evidence to establish a factual account of what happened, history has been seen as a more objective, distanced endeavour, more reliable than memory, but also more detached.

This dichotomy is spelled out by Maurice Halbwachs, a French sociologist who first developed the concept of collective memory. Writing between the two world wars, he noted: "So long as remembrance continues to exist, it is useless to set it down in writing or otherwise fix it in memory… the need to write the history of a period, a society, or even a person is only aroused when the subject is already too distant in the past to allow for the testimony of those who preserve some memory of it."

Much of what we understand today of collective memory draws on Halbwachs' insights. But the study of the Holocaust has broken down the opposition between history and memory, bringing these two modes into fruitful conversation. Historical documentation has been ongoing, robust and abundant. Simultaneously, the voice of testimony has grown more urgent and more resonant.

Poignantly, Halbwachs himself would not live to see the evolution of his concepts. A Catholic professor at the Sorbonne, he was married to a Jewish woman, the daughter of a prominent French Jewish intellectual. Outraged by the roundup of French Jews by the French militia, Halbwachs protested to the Vichy government. After his wife and in-laws were deported to concentration camps, he himself was imprisoned by the Gestapo in Lyons, and then sent to Buchenwald. His death there is recounted by his former student, the novelist Jorge Semprun, who was sent to Buchenwald as a member of the Resistance.

Holocaust commemoration exemplifies Halbwachs' understanding of memory as dynamic, profound and alive. Drawing on diverse sources of knowledge and understanding, it allows us to braid these varied strands into a complex retrieval of the past.

The Kirshner File

Israel and Turkey weather a crisis in relations

Israel's invasion of the Gaza Strip this past January prompted four countries – Mauritania, Qatar, Venezuela and Bolivia – to sever bilateral ties with the Jewish state. Israel took these diplomatic setbacks in stride, but when Turkey condemned Operation Cast Lead, as the massive three-week incursion was dubbed, Israel took the criticism to heart, pulling out all stops to avoid a fullblown rupture of relations.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Although Israel values all its international relationships, even with nations of no real geopolitical importance, Israel was particularly concerned by Turkey's vitriolic response to its invasion of Gaza. Turkey is not only Israel's closest Muslim partner, but it was the first Islamic state to recognize Israel, even though Turkey voted against the 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan. Since the 1990s, Israel's political, economic and military relationship with Turkey has grown exponentially, despite opposition from neighbouring nations such as Iran and Syria, and a flood of Israeli tourists has poured into Turkey.

For a while after January, these gains seemed threatened by Turkey's harsh reaction to Israel's thrust into Gaza. Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan – the leader of a moderate Islamic party – led the charge, describing Israel's land and air campaign as an example of disproportionate force, "a crime against humanity" and "a dark stain on human history."

In a further rebuke, he called for Israel's ouster from the United Nations and deplored its deployment of white phosphorous shells. All the while, he claimed that he is not an anti-Semite, even as he brazenly suggested that the "Jewish-backed media" had circulated a false story that Hamas forced Palestinian civilians in Gaza to be human shields.

Capping his blistering critique, Erdogan, who visited Israel four years ago, petulantly stormed off a stage at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, after an unpleasant verbal exchange with Israel's president, Shimon Peres, who less than two years earlier had become the first Israeli to address the Turkish parliament, the Grand National Assembly. After Erdogan accused Israel of "killing people," Peres, pointing his fingers directly at him, declared that Turkey would have responded in identical fashion had enemy rockets been fired at Istanbul, his hometown.

By all accounts, Erdogan's anger stemmed from his belief that Israel's then-prime minister, Ehud Olmert, had "betrayed" and "stabbed him in the back." Olmert visited Turkey a few days before Israel attacked Gaza, but much to Erdogan's embarrassment, he did not bother informing him of Israel's intentions. As a result, members of Erdogan's Justice and Development party accused him of conspiring with Israel to betray the Palestinians.

Nonetheless, Erdogan rebuffed calls to break relations with Israel, explaining that Turkey's foreign policy is based on reason rather than emotion. As he put it, "Dear friends, we are not running a supermarket here, we are running the Republic of Turkey."

Despite Erdogan's note of caution, Israel came under heavy fire from his government. The president, Abdullah Gul, having cancelled a visit to Israel during the war, deplored the invasion as "a criminal act." The justice minister, Al Mehmet Sahin, went further, asserting that Israel is "the biggest provocateur of terror in the world."

In keeping with the anti-Israel atmosphere prevalent in Turkey, the chief prosecutor's office in Ankara, the Turkish capital, announced an investigation into Israel's operation to determine whether it could be classified as genocide.

Yet even as they demonized Israel, the Turks were careful not to burn their bridges and started the process of mending fences with their Israeli allies. Shortly after the Gaza war ended on Jan. 18, Turkey's deputy prime minister, Cemil Cicek, said, "We want to protect our relations with [Israel]"

In line with this conciliatory approach, Gul sent Peres a letter expressing a desire to visit Israel in the coming months. Meanwhile Erdogan and Peres talked by phone, agreeing that the Davos incident should not affect relations. Olmert, calling them important, asked his fellow ministers to exercise restraint.

To quell lingering tension, the then-Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, met with her Turkish counterpart, Ali Babacan, while Israel's chief of staff, Gen. Gabi Askenazi, apologized for comments made by the commander of Israel's ground forces, Gen. Avi Mizrachi, who criticized Turkey's 1974 invasion of Cyprus and its treatment of ethnic Kurds.

As the crisis wound down, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak, who had been in Ankara only months earlier to tighten military cooperation with Turkey, said, "Turkey is a country of strategic importance in the Middle East. We have a long history of extensive and important ties with Turkey. The sooner we ease tensions and reach a mutual understanding with it on how to fight terror, the better."

In this spirit, Israel's ambassador to Turkey, Gabby Levy, and Turkey's envoy in Israel, Namik Tan, delivered soothing statements in a demonstration of public diplomacy.

Levy, saying that he was working to repair relations, observed that Turkey draws a distinction between bilateral ties and its pique over the invasion. Tan, emphasizing the centrality of Turkey's links with Israel, referred to them as "strategic."

With these upbeat comments, Israel and Turkey patched up their quarrel over Gaza. Turkey took delivery of a shipment of Israeli drones, even as Erdogan hurled invective at Israel, while Israel announced it would hold joint naval exercises with Turkey in the summer.

But if the past is any guide, the simmering Palestinian question is likely to be a source of acrimony yet again in the future.

Turkey denounced "Israeli oppression" of the Palestinians after the outbreak of the first intifadah in 1987. In 1988, Turkey became the first country with formal relations with Israel to recognize the concept of Palestinian independence within the framework of a sovereign state. In 2004, Erdogan branded Israel as a "terrorist state" after it assassinated the spiritual leader of Hamas, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, in Gaza.

Erdogan's party is partial to Hamas, even though Erdogan himself rejects "ethnic nationalism" and politics based on identity. Not long after Hamas won the Palestinian election in 2006, the Justice and Development party invited Khaled Meshal, a senior Hamas official, to Turkey. Erdogan did not meet with Meshal, but he criticized Israel's blockade of Gaza and suggested that Israel should respect the will of the Palestinian electorate.

On the other hand, Erdogan has taken Hamas to task for its use of terrorist violence to achieve political ends. Turkey's foreign minister, who has mediated peace talks between Israel and Syria and is now ready to try again, has been forthright on this issue. He has urged Hamas to abandon armed struggle in favour of working within "the political system."

Beyond the prickly Palestinian issue, Israel and Turkey have disagreed on a number of other issues.

Turkey expressed concern that Israeli jets en route to bombing a nuclear facility in Syria in 2007 jettisoned their fuel tanks near its border with Syria.

Israel annoyed Turkey by rejecting a Turkish Cypriot request to open a representative office in Tel Aviv and to build a field hospital near Gaza. Israel and Turkey have been at odds over Iran's nuclear program. Turkey has repeatedly pressed Israel not to recognize the wholesale massacre of Armenian civilians during World War I.

Despite these irritants, and the fallout from the recent war in Gaza, Israel and Turkey remain close allies.

An investment that appeals to skeptics.

Durban II will 'scapegoat' Jewish people: PM

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

In a Monday-morning conference call with journalists organized by the Washington-based think-tank The Israel Project, Prime Minister Stephen Harper repeated Canada's denunciation of this week's United Nations World Conference Against Racism.

Stephen Harper

Speaking just before the start of the anti-racism conference in Geneva, Harper – who called in from Kingston, Jamaica, where he was scheduled to hold bilateral trade talks with Jamaican Prime Minister Bruce Golding – reminded reporters that in June 2008, Canada was the first country to pull out of the conference, known as Durban II.

At that time, he said, Canada also indicated it "would not fund the participation of Canadian NGOs in the Durban process," he said.

"We're pleased that many countries have since followed Canada's lead in withdrawing."

As of Monday morning, the list of non-participating countries had grown to eight, with the United States, Australia, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands and New Zealand joining Canada and Israel on the sidelines.

Feature

Harper said Canada was "leading the world in championing international understanding and pluralism" and also in its stance against anti-Semitism and racism "in all other forms. We're very concerned that anti-Semitism is growing in volume and acceptance, justified by opposition to Israel itself."

He added: "Canada will not lend its name and reputation to an international conference that promotes these kinds of things."

Citing Canada's participation in the preparatory committee for this year's conference, Harper said it was clear from the start that Durban II will be nothing more than an attempt to "scapegoat the Jewish people."

Harper also criticized the fact that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad – who has repeatedly called for the eradication of the State of Israel and denied the Holocaust – was the only head of state scheduled to address the conference on Monday, and noted that his address was timed "no doubt" to coincide with Yom Hashoah, he said.

"Our government will participate in any international conference that combats racism," Harper said. "We will not, however, lend Canada's good name to those, such as Durban II, that promote it."

Amnesty's dangerous defamation

By HASKELL NUSSBAUM

Amnesty International owes Israel a heartfelt apology. The world's premier human rights organization, with nearly two million members across the globe and the winner of a Nobel Peace Prize, recently called for an embargo against Israel due to its "war crimes," a serious charge.

Only Israel did not commit war crimes.

Under the Geneva Conventions, an attack that kills civilians is a war crime only if it is "excessive in relation to the concrete and direct military advantage anticipated." Amnesty nowhere mentions on what evidence it decided that Israel used "excessive" force compared to the military advantage that Israel anticipated by targeting Hamas personnel and rocket launchers that were aimed at Israeli civilian population centres.

Guest Voice

Moreover, Amnesty also fails to mention that Israel repeatedly took steps to warn the civilian population to avoid proximity to military targets, including phoning civilians on their cellphones to warn them of upcoming strikes on their building – a first in the history of warfare. It does not mention that Israel routinely utilizes "smart" bombs that minimize collateral civilian deaths and that the Hamas launchers were deliberately embedded in densely civilian areas.

Of course, Amnesty did not make these charges in a legal venue. And if the organization was a small, student-run group, one could perhaps forgive them for being careless about the legal implications of their words. But for Amnesty, with its reputable bona fides and its wide experience in courts across the world, one must assume that their words were chosen carefully and for the audience intended: the courtroom of public opinion.

And that is precisely why Amnesty ought to be ashamed. Not only is it defaming a country's behaviour unjustifiably, it is watering down the very concept and terminology of war crimes. It is cheapening the charge of "war crimes" that ought to be legitimately applied when civilians are deliberately targeted and killed. After Amnesty's reckless use of the phrase, when Sudanese president Omar Hassan al-Bashir is charged with "war crimes" one must either draw the conclusion that, for Amnesty, Israel's behaviour is on par with al-Bashir's, or that the term "war crime" is hopelessly broad and effectively meaningless.

Nor is Amnesty alone in its watering down of once-legal concepts and terminology, especially when activists are targeting Israel.

For example, Israel is often accused of being an "apartheid" state. The term apartheid is specific and narrowly defined and it is clear that Israel, which grants full legal rights to its Arab citizens, does not fall into the category. Yet that does not stop a former U.S. president, Jimmy Carter, from using the term in connection with Israel; it does not stop students across the world from convening an annual "Israeli Apartheid Week"; and it does not stop even former Israeli ministers, such as Shulamit Aloni, from making the same charge.

This dangerous trend of watering down legal concepts for the purpose of attacking Israel has already had real implications in the world of law. Thus, a Spanish court recently decided to investigate Israeli soldiers for possible war crimes related to a 2002 attack on a top Hamas terrorist. (The Spanish prosecutor investigator has since suggested the investigation be called off.) The Israeli government has announced that it will help defend soldiers charged with war crimes over their actions in Gaza. And international NGO's such as Human Rights Watch, have called on the UN Security Council to set up a commission of inquiry into alleged Israeli war crimes.

All this is possible because Amnesty and others who defame Israel know that they can do so with impunity. They suffer virtually no negative effects due to their libel. For Amnesty, the organization's deep coffers insulate it from most criticism, and for many of the other NGO's, their anti-Israel agenda is part of their appeal to their funders. There is nary a court in the world where Israel could expect to win a defamation suit against those accusing it of war crimes or of being an apartheid state. And the more effort Israel expends defending itself, the more the charges enter the public's lexicon and, over time, become intractably associated with the Jewish state.

It is for this reason that it is so important for public leaders to "name and shame" those groups who charge Israel with crimes it did not commit and who recklessly water down the effect of heinous crimes by attributing them falsely or without due weight. It is imperative that people who care about human rights protest when the premier human rights organization in the world issues exaggerated and hyperbolic reports about "war crimes." It is vital that victims of the real apartheid in South Africa speak out against the watering down of their pain.

At a minimum, it is time for every one of Amnesty's members to demand that the organization issues an apology to Israel.

Shoah service to be held in Oshawa

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Jenny Eisenstein, a Holocaust survivor who has spent the last six decades performing songs of defiance and hope, will be the special guest at a Holocaust memorial service at the Beth Zion Congregation in Oshawa on Sunday.

Eisenstein, born and raised in Poland, has been performing Jewish and Yiddish folk songs since 1950 for audiences that have included former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and Nobel laureate and Holocaust survivor Elie Wiesel.

She said she likes to represent the poets and writers who documented what happened during World War II while the events were unfolding.

"They wrote poems, they wrote essays, the history of each day they lived through during those devastating years, and I am committed to bring their names to life and let people of today know that we were cultured people and we did not just face the tragedy without being aware of how important it is to memorialize it in writing," said Eisenstein, who was liberated from Auschwitz and currently lives in Thornhill.

During the April 26 memorial service, Eisenstein said she plans to speak about the day the Komionka Ghetto, where she and her family were forced to live near her hometown of Bedzin, Poland, was liquidated.

Having recorded her testimony on paper, Eisenstein said she plans to read her story about the hunger and thirst she and her family experienced, as well as the unsanitary conditions they were forced to live in and the day they were sent to Auschwitz.

Eisenstein said she will also sing songs that were written before and during the war.

One of the songs she'll perform, Es Brent (It Is Burning), written by Mordechai Gebirtig in 1938, was a prophetic song, she said.

"This was a song we sang that was a call before the Nazis came in. He was warning the people. He was inspiring."

One of the verses reads: "It is burning, brothers, it is burning! You are the only source of help. If you value your town, take up the tools to put out the fire, put out the fire with your own blood. Don't just stand there, brothers, with your arms folded. Don't just stand there, brothers. Put out the fire, because our town is burning."

She said that she intentionally chooses songs and poetry that have a message of defiance.

She said that The Partisan Song by Herschel Glick, who was a ghetto fighter from Vilna, is one of those songs that she plans to perform at the service.

"[The song] spread throughout all the concentration camps. That is where I learned it," Eisenstein said.

"It is a song of defiance, it is a song of hope, a song of the energy that we still possess and we mustn't diminish it."

The second and third verses of The Partisan Song are, "From lands of green palm trees to lands all white with snow, we are coming with our pain and with our woe. And where'er a spurt of our blood will drop, our courage will again sprout from that spot.

"For us the morning sun will radiate that day and the enemy and past will fade away. But should the dawn delay our sunrise wait too long, then let all future generations sing this song."

When asked to speak about what the songs mean to her, Eisenstein was overcome with emotion.

"Every time I perform, I pray that my songs will be heard, not only with the ears, but with the heart," she said.

"I see what I sing. I see it before my eyes, the events which have been recorded in that poem. I am hoping that it penetrates my audience."

The message Eisenstein wants younger generations to walk away with is that the Jewish people are strong and must "overcome the difficulties that appear on the horizon.

"We must go beyond it and know that we are worthy to be an independent people. We are worthy to stand in line with any nation and live up to the principles of humanity and of justice."

Lina Zatzman, who organized the service along with Cheryl Frayne and Marian Kassel, said that the service will also memorialize the victims of other genocides, such as the genocide in Rwanda in 1994 and the ongoing genocide in Darfur.

Jewish students dump paper with anti-Israel images

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Two Jewish students at York University took matters into their own hands earlier this month when they found cartoons in a left-wing campus newspaper that depicted Israelis as murderous Nazis killing Palestinians in Gaza

On April 6, the YU Free Press, a new monthly publication backed by union and student groups, issued a statement that said more than 1,000 copies of its March-April edition were thrown out by pro-Israel students Aaron Rosenberg and Moe Levin, who were recorded on video disposing of the papers.

"We found the first copies being put on the stacks and we opened it up to find anti-Semitic cartoons and anti-Israel rhetoric," Levin said.

"The most vehemently anti-Semitic thing in it were the cartoons… We threw it out in the same way that if we saw a swastika we would rub it out."

An article, written by Ali Mustafa, a member of Students Against Israeli Apartheid, included an interview with cartoonist Carlos Latuff and two of Latuff's cartoons about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Latuff – who won second place in Iran's International Holocaust Cartoon Contest in 2006 – is the same cartoonist responsible for the image printed on a recent Israeli Apartheid Week poster that depicted a helicopter labelled "Israel" firing a missile at a teddy-bear-holding toddler labelled "Gaza."

The poster was banned at Carleton University and the University of Ottawa.

One of the cartoons that accompanied Latuff's YU Free Press interview depicts Israelis dressed as Nazis executing people in shallow graves dug in the shape of the word Gaza.

Another image shows a Palestinian wearing a concentration camp uniform lying dead next to the security barrier.

One of two cartoons that appeared in the latest YU Free Press

Levin said the newspaper is "operating under the guise of free expression" but "this isn't criticism of Israel, this is unbridled anti-Semitism."

"What has been going on on campus is a steady evolution from the criticism of Israel to anti-Semitism," he said.

Levin said he has been in contact with MPs and the media to make them aware of the climate at York.

"We're hoping this gets exposed for what it is and that York is allowing this to be published under the guise of free expression."

But in its statement, the YU Free Press said that whether or not the cartoons are anti-Semitic is not the most important issue.

"What is of importance here is not so much the disputed content in question and whether or not it constitutes a particular kind of racism, but the fact that the elected response taken by these two individuals was to decide the matter for students rather than allowing them the opportunity to decide it for themselves."

Victoria Barnett, a member of the YU Free Press editorial collective, said the article and the photos fell within the newspaper's mandate, which is funded by unions such as CUPE 3903, which represents sessional teachers and teaching assistants at York, and student groups such as Ontario Public Interest Research Group, an organization that supports groups such as the Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid.

"I don't think it's anti-Semitic, but it is a political cartoon," Barnett said.

"In the article, [Latuff] talks about his reasons for drawing particular things, and I think the cartoons are like any political cartoons that you can look up in other papers."

When asked if an image that paints all Israelis as murderous Nazis can incite hatred against Israelis as a collective group, she said, "I understand what you're saying, but… if the cartoons were anti-Semitic, if it was seen as a hate crime, we could be charged with that. But it's not… There is not enough evidence to press charges against us."

She added that the real issue is the fact that Levin and Rosenberg committed theft when they disposed of the newspapers.

"I understand people's discomfort with the cartoons, but there are other avenues of disagreeing with that and not throwing it out."

She said people should refer to the mandate of the newspaper, which states that it's "opposed to oppression in all its possible forms, and anti-Semitism falls under the idea of oppression in some sense."

York spokesperson Richard Fisher said that while "community groups are approved to get stands [to distribute publications on campus]… we don't have any control on the content. We also distribute the Toronto Star, and we have no control over that, either."

He said three complaints against the newspaper have been filed with the university and referred to York's human rights office.

In its press release, the paper's editorial collective said that it also filed a complaint with York, but Fisher said the administration has yet to receive one.

Toronto's Jewish Community celebrates Yom Ha'atzmaut

Sherman Campus hosts Independence Day festivities

Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations on Wednesday, April 29 promises fun for everyone.

On Wednesday, April 29, UJA Federation's Sherman Campus will be home to a family-friendly celebration in honour of the 61st anniversary of Israel's Independence Day (Yom Ha'atzmaut).

Jewish Toronto is joining Jewish communities from around the world to mark Israel's birthday.

The celebration, which will take place in the Sherman Campus' south parking lot beginning at 5:30 p.m., will feature live Israeli music, inflatable carnival rides, children's entertainment, Israeli food and a kosher barbecue.

Thousands are expected to attend the annual celebration, sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and its Israeli Forum.

"This is a wonderful opportunity to not only celebrate Israel for its extraordinary accomplishments, its vibrant diversity and democracy, but to also celebrate the shared values between our community here in Toronto and Israel," said Mark Gold, chair of UJA Federation's Israeli Forum.

The Israeli Forum was established by UJA Federation to reperesent and cater to the unique needs of the Israeli Canadian community, utilizing their strength and resources to create an umbrella network.

"Toronto and Israel have always shared a unique and unbreakable bond, a bond that began even before the creation of the state itself," said UJA Federation board chair, David Koschitzky. "Each year, on Yom Ha'atzmaut, we have the opportunity to celebrate Israel and all that she means to us, with our friends and loved ones. Yom Ha'atzmaut has always been a special day in the lives of Jewish Torontonians, and this year's festivities promise to be unforgettable."

Women's Philanthropy: new name, same commitment

By Daniel Horowitz

The chair, vice chair and executive of United Jewish Appeal's Women's Philanthropy (formerly known as Women's Campaign & Advocacy) were recently installed, and with this talented roster of volunteers, things bode well for the coming year.

Liora Yakubowicz, the immediate past chair of Women's Campaign & Advocacy, explained the name change during the installation ceremony, recently held at The Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services, situated on Sherman Campus.

"Beginning with this evening's installation, we will be known as Women's Philanthropy," explained Yakubowicz. "The name Women's Philanthropy reflects the reality of the work all of us do at United Jewish Appeal – raising urgently needed funds, encouraging connection, community and friendship."

More than 100 people in attendance were introduced to the new chair of Women's Philanthropy, Andrea Cohen, and vice chair Sarena Koschitzky.

"The late Golda Meir once said, 'I would like to think that some day, when our dreams have been fulfilled, they will say it was women, giving of their ideas and resources, that made the difference,'" said Cohen. "Golda's words were visionary, and I feel incredibly proud to be standing here today in the wake of her legacy, representing UJA Women's Philanthropy."

The foundation of Women's Philanthropy is based upon six pillars:

- Talmud Torah – Jewish Learning
- Chesed – Kindness and Caring
- Tzedakah – Social Justice
- Elu V'elu – Diversity and Unity
- Ahavat Israel – Love of Israel
- Tikun Olam – Repairing the World

"I have many goals and dreams for the coming year," said Cohen. "But, most importantly, I want every woman on my team to feel personally invested in our work. I want the year to be educational – I want us to learn more about the needs and to understand the impact of our work – because therein lies the true value of our collective effort. We know that we have a challenging year ahead; but it is particularly during times like these that we must remind ourselves of the many people both in Israel and here, at home, that depend on the efforts of UJA."

The chairs of United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2010, Debbie Kimel and Ken Tanenbaum, also addressed those in attendance.

"Lisa, let me begin by wishing you a yasher koach," said Kimel - a past chair of Women's Campaign & Advocacy - to Lisa Draper, the outgoing chair of Women's Philanthropy, and the new chair of Campaign Operations for 2010. "Your passion inspired women in Toronto to become involved, and truly make a difference in the lives of so many. You inspired the women of our community to step forward, roll up their sleeves and shine."

"Debbie and I are confident that the women of our community will once again step up and show just how important a woman's gift, a woman's commitment, and a woman's touch is to this upcoming, important campaign," said Tanenbaum. "There is simply no limit to what motivated women, working together, can accomplish."

Women's Philanthropy Executive 2010: *Seated (l-r): Nurit Barr, Lisa Draper, immediate past chair; Andrea Cohen, chair; Sarena Koschitzky, vice chair and Felicia Posluns. 'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

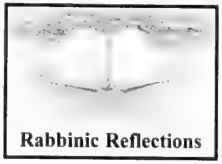
The story of Job: a lesson for today

By RABBI ELEANOR STEINMAN



My strategy for reading the news each morning is like the way I watch a horror movie. I place my hands over my eyes and only watch through the slits in my fingers. Each time something scary happens on the screen, whether in a movie or on the computer, I quickly cover my eyes.

The difference between a horror movie and the daily news, however, is that the horror movie usually ends after about 90 minutes, whereas each day, the horrible reality of the current economic downturn and its far-reaching effects on people throughout the world seems never-ending.

Many individuals and families are suffering from the repercussions of the present economy, and responding to the sufferer can be challenging for each of us. Our tradition has much to teach us in this area.

The ancient story of Job, a man scrupulously moral, religious, one who has avoided evil, seems to characterize so many in 2009. Job loses everything. His flocks, his servants, even his children. In an instant, all of those safe investments disappear, seemingly into thin air. He sits in mourning, and three friends come to visit. Eliphaz, Bildad and Zophar come from different locations and simply sit with Job until he is ready to speak.

Job mourns his losses. When he speaks, he curses his conception. He feels that if he had never existed, then perhaps none of these tragedies could have occurred and he would not have to experience such profound pain.

His friends present differing theologies that encourage Job to blame or curse God for the problems in his life. Job does not ask for his friends' advice, though they do not hesitate to offer it. Instead of actively listening, Eliphaz, Bildad and Zophar respond, perhaps trying to follow the way our tradition teaches us to comfort a mourner. There is no response to suffering, and it is challenging to find an adequate response to Job.

Job only gets frustrated and angry, however. He will not curse God, for this is not the theology by which he lives his life. Ultimately, in the course of dialogue, God communicates directly with Job from a whirling storm.

The lesson to take from Job is that the process of asking the questions and searching for meaning is perhaps most important. Job teaches us, when we are ready, to engage in theodicy, a vindication of God's justice in the face of evil, even as those closest to us pose challenges.

After moving through the process of grief, adjusting to the new way of life – perhaps forced upon us unwillingly – we are better able to work on our relationship with God instead of making the current moment function around a notion of God that no longer operates for us in the world.

The search for meaning in the madness is vital for each of us as individuals and as members of the Jewish community interested in supporting those in need.

There is no doubt that the current financial crisis is like a horror film for those who have lost and, unfortunately, will continue to lose. The hope is that when the lights come up and the movie ends, the Jewish community will remain a source of strength and support in the good times just as in the dark hours.

God's presence is steadfast. As it is written in Micah, "Though I have fallen, I rise again;/ Though I sit in darkness, the Eternal is my light."

Rabbi Eleanor Steinman is a rabbi at Temple Sinai Congregation in Toronto.

These were Jewish victims

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Yom Hashoah is a time for us to take a day to remember the murdered victims of the Holocaust who died because they were Jewish. The events of the Holocaust are being recognized more and more throughout the western world, but only the first half of the previous sentence seems to have meaning in that context.

The murdered victims of the Holocaust teach the world about a terrible act of attempted genocide. It creates an unprecedented reference point of the evil to which humanity can sink. It still generates heated debates on the ethical use of Nazi scientific experimentation data. Governments take time to recognize the horror of the events, and laws are there to protect the denial of these events. The intent is to preserve the memory of the victims and to try to keep this moment in history as an anomaly. All of these things are essential and good. But the word "Jewish" rarely gets highlighted.

Holocaust education has been transformed into genocide education, and although there are certainly crucial and much-needed lessons for all human beings to take from this education, it doesn't include the foundational role of anti-Semitism in the Holocaust. Without making the clear connection between the Holocaust and anti-Semitism, the most fundamental Jewish lesson is never taught.

Shocking studies within secular western schools reveal that the average adolescent involved in Holocaust education believes that Jews really did control all the money and media in pre-Nazi Germany. Of course, this doesn't excuse genocide, but it means Jews were partly to blame, since they conspired to control the wealth. This is the result of Holocaust education without the anti-Semitic component.

As Jews, we hold the value of honouring others and preserving any life that is threatened as one of our highest priorities. We don't speak too much of ourselves, either, because it sounds prideful or because it builds the image of the Jew as victim. By not emphasizing that six million Jews died because they were Jewish and guilty of nothing, we aren't revealing or confronting the subtle acceptance of anti-Semitic myth that lies just beneath the surface of these discussions.

A recent paper delivered at Yale University discussed studies conducted within secular Holocaust education venues that revealed classical anti-Semitic attitudes and beliefs among top students. The Holocaust education they received removed the Jewish component and left anti-Jewish myths unchallenged. By removing anything Jewish, the education was now multicultural.

Interestingly, ancient Jewish text touches on the question of warfare that includes the component of perception. The Torah describes the nation of Amalek as a nation that embodies evil for its own sake. Amalek launched an unprovoked attack against the Israelites in the desert. We're commanded to remember what this nation did and to erase its name from the world.

Tradition believes that Haman and Hitler were descendants of Amalek. According to the midrash, one of the most severe damages we endured from Amalek is that although they failed in an ultimate battle against us, they changed the perception of the other nations with regard to Israel. Henceforth, the fledgling nation had to fight the battle of perception as well. How chilling and parallel it is that while the Nazi regime was defeated, its legitimization of anti-Semitic views remains widespread and growing.

This year on Yom Hashoah, we must be certain to remember the words of the Sages who warned us of true evil. It's not only the number of victims that are to be remembered. It's also crucial to remember their innocence. True evil is clever enough to know that changing the perceptions of the world and convincing them of a lie is still a victory.

Archeology and the birth of Israel

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

The birth of Israel in 1948 marked the start of a flurry of archeological activity in the fledgling state. A number of reasons may account for this.

It may be because, as a new state, Israel was looking to a glorious and hallowed past to bond its diverse population together, as well as to inspire them for the formidable task of building a new nation. Archeology would provide tangible proof that there had been a Jewish presence in Israel for a long time before the establishment of the state in modern times. This common history was something that all Jews shared, regardless of where they came from in the Diaspora.

By as early as 1949, archeological excavations had begun in earnest in the new Jewish state. Benjamin Mazar led one of the first excavations at the site of Tel Qasile, which was located on the campus of Tel Aviv University.

Ironically, Tel Qasile was first settled by the Philistines, the archenemies of the Israelites, at the dawn of the conquest of Canaan, circa 1200 BCE. The Philistines were part of the Sea Peoples, who had close links with the Mycenaean Greeks. These Mycenaean Greeks were the same people whom many scholars think were responsible for the destruction of Troy.

It is an amazing coincidence that these two peoples, the Israelites and the Greeks, who would have such an enormous impact on western civilization, should meet in a life and death struggle at the dawn of both of their histories. It is one of the great ironies of history that the epic stories of these two groups, who provide the foundation of western civilization, were interwoven from such an early time.

But it was another site that would capture the imagination of the new nation and turn its already famous excavator into even more of a household name. The site was Hazor, and its renowned director was Yigael Yadin, who had gained fame as the young chief of staff of the Haganah during the War Of Independence. Afterward, Yadin would become even better known to the public when he managed to retrieve a number of the Dead Sea Scrolls for the State of Israel. These were scrolls that Yadin's father, Prof. Eliezer Sukenik of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, had helped bring to the attention of the world a few years earlier.

While excavating Hazor, Yadin ran across what he considered to be substantive proof for the conquest of Canaan by the ancient Israelites. Here was a site that showed how the ancestors of the modern Israelis had conquered the land that God had promised to Abraham. It was a task that would have to be repeated again by the citizens of the new Jewish state as they fought to preserve their country against hostile neighbours.

At Hazor, Yadin assembled a team that would dominate archeology in Israel for more than a generation. Furthermore, his team would also become the directors of most of the newly emergent institutes of archeology in the new state.

The team included Yohanan Aharoni, who would go on to direct the Institute of Archaeology at Tel Aviv University and would become Yadin's opponent on the key issue of the conquest of Canaan in the years to come. Also part of the Hazor team was Ruth Amiran, who would go on to write the definitive work on Israelite pottery titled Ancient Pottery of the Holy Land. Trude Dothan and her husband, Moshe, would become the pre-eminent authorities on the Philistines. They would also individually direct the excavations of a number of major archeological sites, including Ashdod, Acco and Ekron.

But it was another site that Yadin would excavate a few years later that not only captured the imagination of Israel, but captivated the world. That site was Masada. No wonder archeology had become a national pastime in the new nation.

Business ethics in tough times

Jewish law has a lot to say about observing Shabbat and eating kosher. But what about how to declare bankruptcy or the proper way to compete for a job? In these tough times, people are facing difficult decisions. Fortunately, Jewish law is able to able to adapt ancient principles to the most modern dilemmas.

Many of the sites that I point to have responses from several rabbis who may interpret sources in different ways. As with any religious questions, please consult a trusted rabbi who understands the details of your particular situation. Many of the halachot of proper business conduct are derived from the body of law called the Choshen Mishpat, which can be studied online in its original [tinyurl.com/ethics01], as well as applied to contemporary situations. [tinyurl.com/ethics02] Following are some of the questions they address.

Can a corporation decide to close down an unprofitable business despite the effect it will have on its workers and the community?

Meir Tamari, founder of the Business Ethics Center of Jerusalem, says yes, "provided this is done without fraud, coercion or dishonesty. Judaism would uphold this right." However, Tamari adds, "There are also no rights without obligations… firms, faced with declining profits… are required to assist the workers affected by downsizing." Tamari calls this assistance a form of tzedakah and then adds one more "however": "One is not required to make oneself poor in order to give charity." [tinyurl.com/ethics05]

Is there a Jewish way to lay off workers?

A recent article in Forward tells the story of someone who had worked almost 25 years for a Jewish institution and was laid off two years short of retirement. Rabbi Elliot Dorff, feels that "it's just mean, frankly, to fire people at that stage." Rabbi Dorff says that Jewish texts and tradition are filled with discussion about the importance of work – and the responsibility that employers have to employees. When his own institution, the American Jewish University, faced cutbacks, staff elected to take salary cuts as a group rather than allowing any individuals to lose their jobs. [tinyurl.com/ethics06]

I came across a fascinating case heard by the beit din of Haifa about a school maintenance worker who was dismissed after 12 years service. The court ordered the employer to go beyond the letter of the law, to not only pay him an enhanced severance fee but also assist him in finding another job "in order 'to do that which is just and good." [tinyurl.com/ethics07]

Should I allow a needy person to take a job instead of me? The Talmud says it is also praiseworthy to give someone who is poor precedence in obtaining a benefit. "A poor person who is seeking after a piece of bread and someone else comes along and takes it… [that person] is considered wicked." (Kiddushin 59a) However, Rabbi Asher Meir points out that an "employer is not just giving out the jobs on a first-come, first-serve basis; rather, an employer is interested in selecting the most qualified candidates." As well, you usually can't be certain that person will get the job if you pull out. The bottom line: you are under no ethical obligation to drop your candidacy on behalf of someone who seems more needy. However, it would be a thoughtful act if it seems likely the job would go to them. [tinyurl.com/ethics08]

Although many of these laws may sound logical, you can't just wing it with Jewish business ethics and hope to get it right. That's where this anecdote comes in. A ritual slaughterer once approached Rabbi Yisroel Salanter with a dilemma. The shochet said that he was getting older and becoming fearful of making mistakes that may cause others to eat non-kosher meat. He wished to stop slaughtering and go into business instead. Rabbi Salanter asked if he was an expert in the Jewish laws of slaughtering. "Of course, rebbe."

Rabbi Salanter then asked, "Are you an expert in the Jewish laws of business?"

The student laughed. "Of course not. Very few people learn those laws."

Rabbi Salanter replied, "You are not making any sense. If you are prepared to stop slaughtering because of your fear of sinning, even though you are an expert in the laws, how much more so should you fear sinning in business, in which you have no expertise!" [tinyurl.com/ethics04]

New name reflects 'change of emphasis,' Farber

Farber acknowledged that CJC has received many e-mails and calls since the news broke just before Passover, but he said not all of them have been negative. He said CJC has also heard from Jewish and non-Jewish Quebecers who "can't understand what all the fuss is about… They say, 'What took you so long to do this?'"

He noted that the Quebec national assembly adopted a unanimous motion, spearheaded by its sole Jewish member, D'Arcy McGee's Lawrence Bergman, congratulating CJC on the new name. Premier Jean Charest is clearly federalist, he added, and would not likely support anything that suggested sympathy for separatism. (Bloc québécois leader Gilles Duceppe also reportedly commented favourably on the new moniker.)

Farber said all of the e-mails were answered, and when CJC's position was explained, he said many replied that they now understood better.

He said he wishes some of the people who have so passionately "come out of the woodwork" against the change would put some of that energy into working with CJC on what he thinks are far more pressing issues. He said the organization is looking for people to volunteer on its committees, and any Jew in good standing with the local federation is eligible to run for a CJC office.

"If there is a silver lining in all this, it's that it shows how people have embraced CJC, that they feel a sense of ownership toward it."

The sharp and immediate reaction is surprising given that CJC has a diminished profile in Quebec compared to even 10 years ago.

Farber, to whom questions on the issue were referred by QJC officials, admitted that "our biggest failure is, we ought to have judged that there would be some strong feedback and had a response readily in place."

Goldbloom, who steps down as regional chair on July 1, said the reaction to the name change was a little more heated than he expected.

"I thought more people would have a strategic understanding that it would be positively perceived in Quebec, where we live. I think the majority will come to understand that it was a good decision for the community."

On April 8, CJC national co-presidents Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa and Sylvain Abitbol of Montreal issued a letter stating that the name change "emanated from a desire for both a closer association and a clearer identification with Quebec society, particularly French Quebec society."

They added that the discussions leading up to the decision "reflected all walks of Quebec Jewish life, including both anglophone and francophone Jews" and was consistent with the move by the Canada-Israel Committee to change the name of its Quebec region to the Quebec-Israel Committee a few years ago.

The CIC, a pro-Israel lobby that works largely behind the scenes with government and media, is quite a different entity, however, from the 90-year-old CJC, which claims to speak for the Jewish community and, in fact, to be its "parliament."

Rabbi Bulka and Abitbol observe that at neither the CJC regional level nor the national board level was there "any controversy or negativity expressed and, in fact, the comments made only reflected how this would be appreciative and illustrative of our two founding nations."

Lawrence Bergman

There was plenty of controversy, however, among the grassroots. Numerous irate calls were received at The CJN, and the issue became the subject of a popular call-in radio show and an informal television poll. The vast majority of respondents were against the change.

Côte St. Luc city councillor Glen Nashen wrote on his blog: "What were the CJC 'parliamentarians' thinking when they came up with this marketing nugget? Did they consider their constituents, the vast majority of whom would hardly ever associate with the politically charged term 'Québécois', since the notion of the Quebec nation is a political minefield?"

Seeking approval from the national assembly on "internal Jewish communal matters" is also problematic for Nashen and is "of little comfort" to the the province's Jews, who, he argues, have little faith in their legislators to represent their interests.

He faults CJC for not consulting the community beforehand. "A matter of such fundamental importance should have been well communicated in advance," he writes.

Typical of some comments made to The CJN is the opinion of Stanley Baker, who, in a letter to the editor, asks: "Where do the Quebec regional officers get the idea that Quebec Jews would welcome the change? Everyone I spoke to about it was ardently against the change. They feel they are Canadian Jews, who happen to live in the Province of Quebec… There is a hint of separatism in it."

Ottawa caterer supported 'every Jewish cause'

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Jack Smith, Ottawa's best-known kosher caterer, died April 7 at age 77.

Because of the onset of Pesach and the great distances many of his family had to travel, his funeral was not held until April 12. People came from far and wide to pay their respects to a man who was larger than life. The funeral chapel was nearly filled to capacity an hour before the scheduled time of the funeral and was overflowing when the ceremony began.

Jack Smith

The second-youngest in a family of 13 siblings, Smith himself was the father of 10, grandfather of 12 and great-grandfather of one.

His son, Nathan, summarized his father's attributes, noting that he was "a loving husband, a father, a zaide, a great grand-dad, the preemie son of a shoemaker, one of 13 siblings, the go-to guy for any need at any time; a shul builder, a camp builder, a community builder, a stalwart supporter of every Jewish cause on earth, and my best friend."

His presence was known and felt throughout the community, as his business and philanthropy were always intertwined. Families, organizations and simchahs of every kind were the beneficiaries of Smith's business, Creative Kosher Catering, which is now run by his son, David.

Obituary

Stories abound in the Jewish community of Smith's largesse. Nathan spoke of the many notes that the family received telling of his father's kindness.

"Many of the notes spoke about the many a bris, bar mitzvah and wedding our dad catered, knowing the people could not pay him but telling them not to worry, that everyone should be able to have a simchah like a mensch."

Having worked seven days a week since childhood, Smith enjoyed a "forced retirement" caused by a near-death heart attack and stroke a dozen years ago. He was not expected to live but, to the amazement of all, he was able to have 12 more years with his family.

His eldest son, Moishe Smith, president of B'nai B'rith International, credited Linda, his father's wife for the past quarter century (first wife, Inez, died in a car accident in 1975) for keeping his father alive and happy, and for being a devoted and loving mother to them all.

"I am going to tell all of you here, the unsung hero of the life of Jack Smith is our mom, Linda. Our family enjoyed 12 extra years of our dad because of her. She treated my dad like a prince, like the prince that he was, and none of us will ever forget her for that."

Smith was a volunteer fundraiser extraordinaire, lending his hand to more than 20 local community charities. He worked for State of Israel Bonds, B'nai B'rith, the Jewish Federation of Ottawa and the Jewish National Fund, which honoured him at its 1988 dinner. He also served as president of Camp B'nai Brith, where all of his children spent happy summers, and he was a driving force behind the B'nai B'rith Millionaire's Night and Man of the Year Dinner, and was instrumental in raising great sums of money for Congregation Machzikei Hadas.

The shul's spiritual leader, Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka, recalled how Smith had devised the idea of giving away a Rolls Royce as a raffle prize for the synagogue, intent on ensuring that his beloved shul would be able to carry on and not be in financial difficulty.

Bulka reminded the congregation that "the rules say you are not supposed to be sad on chol hamoed."

He concluded his eulogy by saying to Jack Smith, "Thank you for all that you did for our community, for our shul, for all of our families."

Israel ought to strike Iran soon: ex-envoy

'There are no non-military solutions that will stop Iran from going nuclear'

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Retired Israeli ambassador to the United States, Yoram Ettinger, believes that Israel ought to strike Iran militarily "not in a matter of months but hopefully in the next few days."

In an interview following his keynote address in Winnipeg on April 13, at a Passover luncheon sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, Ettinger said: "Pre-emption is essential. There are no non-military solutions that will stop Iran from going nuclear."

Ettinger, who served from 1989 to '92 as minister of congressional affairs at Israel's Embassy in Washington, added that "every day Israel waits [to attack Iran] makes it more difficult to do."

Israel should not "delude itself" into thinking that the notion of retaliation would convince a nuclear Iran not to attack Israel militarily, he said. "Israel does not have an option of retaliation... If Iran goes nuclear, the mere threat of an attack on Israel will be enough to take the state down.

"The economy would slow down, foreign investment would slow down, aliyah would slow down, people in Israel would want to leave the country, and this would doom the Jewish state into gradual extinction."

Yoram Ettinger

He said the concept that Israel's option of retaliation would deter Iran, "ignores the reality that in 1980 to 1986, Iran proved itself willing to sacrifice two million of its people, including one million children, in its six-year war with Iraq."

He added: "Whatever the costs of an operation [in terms of human life or, political, military or economic consequences] would be dwarfed by the costs of Iran dropping a nuclear bomb on Israel."

Ettinger said that Israel has shown before that it will take action, notwithstanding world public opinion, when it has felt it had to.

"In 1981, [then-prime minister] Menachem Begin made the decision to destroy Iraq's nuclear reactor, in defiance of the U.S.'s threat to excommunicate him, in defiance of what the Europeans and the world wanted, in defiance of what the Mossad and military intelligence advised him... He did it even though his minister of defence Ezer Weitzman was against it, and though [then-Labor party leader] Shimon Peres opposed it and leaked it to the press... he did it for Israel's long term interests," Ettinger said

Ettinger, a former director of the Government Press Office in Jerusalem from 1988 to '89, said he believes that the "global atmosphere [against a military strike] is less problematic today than in 1981," adding that "1981 was before 9/11, before the terror attacks in London and Spain, before the war in Afghanistan."

When asked if he thought Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu would decide to strike Iran militarily, he replied: "I don't know," adding that he hoped that Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak would make the decision to do so.

He said he hoped that the reason Barak decided to join Netanyahu's government was that the two both understood that there ought to be a military strike on Iran.

"The question is, 'Are we headed by politicians or statesmen [such as Begin] who are willing to sacrifice short-term inconvenience for long-term interests?'" he said.

Ettinger said he voted for Likud in the recent election, not because he liked Netanyahu but to try to help more people at the bottom of Likud get into the Knesset, "because the bottom of Likud has better people than the top," he added.

Since retiring, Ettinger has been a consultant to Israeli cabinet members and legislators, and to the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee on U.S.-Israel bilateral projects, U.S. policy and Mideast politics.

When asked why he didn't vote for Avigdor Lieberman, leader of the Yisrael Beitenu party and now Israel's foreign minister, Ettinger said: "Because he has said he's committed to the 'road map' [peace plan], which will lead to a two-state solution." Ettinger said he doesn't believe in a two-state solution.

Mumbai terrorism victim recalls horrific ordeal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Mumbai terrorism survivor Michael Rudder believes education is the best way to eradicate the kind of fanaticism that led gunmen from Pakistan to pump four bullets into him, nearly claiming his life.

Rudder, 58, a Montreal-based actor, was among the more than 300 people injured in the at least 10 co-ordinated shooting and bombing attacks that took place in India's financial capital between Nov. 26 and 29. Two of his friends, an American man and the man's 13-year-old daughter, were among the 173 killed.

Rudder was sitting with these two friends and a few others, who had come to India to further their study of transcendental meditation, in the restaurant of the luxury Oberoi Trident Hotel when they were suddenly sprayed with gunfire. About 30 people died in that attack.

Rudder vividly recreated that horrifying scene in a talk at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, sponsored by the Men's Association. It was his first extensive public statement about what happened and how he is coping since he returned to Canada in December.

He did not express any bitterness towards his attackers nor did he say he forgave them. The worst he said of them is that they were "punks" and "pathetic", who were reared in poverty and ignorance. His strongest feelings are for those who trained them and masterminded the attacks, and he would like to talk to them directly.

"[The attackers] are guided like puppets, they are trained to hate. They spend two years lying in a field to become instruments of hatred," Rudder said. He believes that they were taken advantage of by those who can give them food in exchange for indoctrination.

The free world, he believes, must do all it can to promote education in disadvantaged parts of the world. Rudder believes the majority of people everywhere want a happy life for themselves and their families. "But they must have the knowledge of peace to have a thirst for it…If all they know is hate, that is how people respond to others.

"I'm not an expert in Islamic terrorism, but I think we have to do everything we can to break down that mindset."

Asked if the would be a witness for the prosecution in any trial connected to the Mumbai attacks, Rudder said "absolutely."

Rudder, a veteran film, stage and TV actor, credits his meditative practice to helping him to stay calm throughout the assault and to come to terms with what happened since then, as he continues to physically and psychologically heal.

Rudder was shot in the right arm, left thigh, the rectum and in the head, the bullet penetrating his skull but not touching his brain. He lost a huge amount of blood during the delay in getting medical treatment, and knows he was on the verge of death. Since returning to Montreal, he has undergone another series of surgeries.

Michael Rudder

Today, he says he is health is quite good, but he has not regained the strength and stamina he enjoyed beforehand.

Psychologically, he describes himself as still shaky, but continues to work at finding a balance between mind, body and soul, through exercise and reflection. "My response has been, 'can I become more loving to everyone I interact with?'"

He has had nightmares of being chased by terrorists, from which he wakes up in a cold sweat, or of having been able to save his friend and his daughter.

His practice of TM has given him serenity, and has taught him respect for others, he said.

Terrorism in a country he reveres for its spirituality and the gentleness of its people has been a terrible irony for him, as is the fact that his friends, who were so devoted to peace and harmony, were among its victims.

"The way I perceived the event was directly influenced by the state of consciousness, the elevated awareness, that I was in at the time," he said. "We were all in an exalted state."

His group of six were seated in the back of the restaurant on that day. If they had sat in the front as they usually did, Rudder thinks they probably all would have been slain.

All of a sudden, two men with automatic weapons blazing entered the room, and Rudder and the others dove under the table. It was soon a hellish scene of chaos and carnage, but somehow he was able to observe it all with an extraordinary detachment.

He looked upon his own bloodied body with an equanimity that surprises him now. In fact, his reaction was a kind of twisted humour. "I said to myself this is like Die Hard with a Vengeance."

'I waited to be executed,' says Rudder

When he heard the blood gurgling in his throat as his friend lay dying, "I thought this is so unfair" but accepted it.

Another friend, shot in the back, had fallen on top of him and he could not move.

He lost consciousness for awhile, and when he awoke the survivors had been taken away. He apparently had been taken for dead.

What sounded like a grenade went off 30 feet away, and then another. He knew it wasn't over and as he recalled, "I waited to be executed."

Rudder said the reading he had done on the Holocaust (one of his roles was in the TV movie Varian's War) and how concentration camp inmates pretended to be dead in order to avoid being shot came to mind as he lay there face down in a pool of blood. He remained very still.

Then he heard liquid being poured in the lobby. It was gasoline and the terrorists were creating a smokescreen between them and the army.

Rudder knew if he coughed it would be over for him, so he crawled on the floor into the kitchen, and eventually to the exit doors only to be confronted by a police officer pointing a gun at him. When it was determined he was a victim, Rudder was bundled into a tiny taxi along with another man with a stomach wound and rushed to the hospital by a very frightened driver who had to make his way through the alarmed throngs on the street.

Victims of last fall's terror attack in Mumbai are returned to Ben-Gurion Airport. [Israel Sun photo]

He collapsed finally and spent weeks in intensive care in Mumbai. He has nothing but praise for his doctors and nurses for their kindness. The young staff called him "dear uncle," a term of affection and respect for an elder. "I cried when I left," Rudder said. He contrasted this solicitude with the sometimes brusque attention he has received since in Quebec hospitals.

Rudder said the love of friends and family and his ability to go inside himself through meditation have been a great comfort in the last few months.

But the enlightenment he experienced during his ordeal is already starting to dissipate, he admits. "Before coming here I cut myself shaving and I cursed like a baby because there was a bit of blood."

Emunah dinner set for May 13

Compiled by CJN Staff

Emunah Women of Toronto is honouring Monty and Eileen Kobrin at its annual Family-in-Israel dinner, set for May 13 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

The Kobrins are being recognized for their support of Emunah Women. Eileen Kobrin is co-president of the organization, and secretary of Emunah Canada.

Also at the dinner, longtime Emunah donors Alex and Rose Colchary will be presented with the community award for their fundraising efforts on behalf of Israel. Rose Colchary has spearheaded a number of events, raising money for the organizations projects in Israel.

Proceeds from the dinner will go to Emunah's new centre for teenage girls at risk in Neve Michael, as well as to the Ashkelon Daycare Centre, to provide psychological treatment and trauma relief for children and families affected by rocket attacks in their area during the recent fighting in Gaza.

Guest speaker is Barbara Crook, associate director and North American representative of Palestinian Media Watch, a Jerusalem-based organization that studies Palestinian society by monitoring and translating media.

An Ottawa resident, Crook has been active in a number of Jewish organizations including Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, Jewish Education Through Torah (JET), the Jewish Federation of Ottawa , and the Jewish National Fund.

Anti-Semitism down in Quebec

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — B'nai Brith Canada legal counsel Steven Slimovitch thinks it's no coincidence that the number of anti-Semitic incidents in Quebec that the organization recorded in 2008 is down from the previous year.

"Why? Because there was no Bouchard-Taylor commission. The public hearings were a free-for-all for those who wanted to express hateful views," Slimovitch said.

Last year, B'nai Brith claimed that the spike in reported incidents in 2007 could be attributed at least in part to the often bigoted opinions about Jews and other minorities expressed during the months of hearings held throughout the province by Bouchard-Taylor commission on reasonable accommodation.

B'nai Brith's latest audit documents 245 anti-Semitic incidents in Quebec in 2008, compared to 291 in 2007, a decrease of nearly 16 per cent, which contrasts with an increase by almost as much in Canada as a whole.

A quarter of the 245 incidents occurred during July and August alone.

The organization says many of these incidents were directed at haredi Jews who summer in the country, mainly the Laurentians, and is a continuation of a disturbing trend observed in 2007.

The view the Bouchard-Taylor was providing a platform for anti-Semitism and possibly encouraging it was disputed by the commission after the audit of 2007 was released by B'nai Brith. At that time, the commission's spokesperson Sylvain Leclerc pointed out that, according to B'nai Brith's own records, the rate in the rise of anti-Semitic incidents actually dropped after the commission was created in February 2007.

He noted that the B'nai Brith audit of 2006 showed that the number of anti-Semitic incidents in the province had risen by 70 per cent over the year before. The 2007 audit found an increase of 29 per cent over the previous year.

Leclerc said it could be argued that the commission's existence had slowed an upward trend in incidents.

Besides Bouchard-Taylor's fading from the scene, Slimovitch believes the media coverage of the court appearances over the past couple of years of the two men convicted of the firebombings of an Outremont yeshiva in 2006 and the Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre in 2007 and the stiff sentences eventually handed down to them also had a deterrent effect.

חדשה בקנדה

נינה שנהב

אני לא אומרת שהזמנים טובים במיוחד, אני גם לא אומרת ההיפך. בסך הכל, אני חיה במדינה שרציתי, עם האנשים שרציתי, אני אוהבת את עצמי (יחסית), אני חביבה לסובבים אותי (יחסית), אני מתנדבת הרבה, והולכת לישון כל לילה עם מצפון נקי.
זהו, שהמצפון שלי נקי. הבית שלי - לא.
זה לא שאני לא אוהבת לנקות, זה שאני שונאת לנקות. מריבות עקובות דם עם מאיר בנושא הניקיון, נחתמות בכך שאני מסתגרת בחדר השינה בעצבים, ומאיר משוטט בסלון עם סמרטוט ריצפה רטוב ומטליות אבק. בסוף, אני נאותה לצאת מהחדר, רק כדי לתת לו לאוורר מיטות ולקרצף את האמבטיה הפרטית.
לפני שלושה שבועות, מאיר קרא דרור, והתפטר ממני. כלומר, צילצל לדרור, חבר שלו, ושכר את שירותי עוזרת הבית שלו.
לא אפרתי מילה. שיבזבז את הכסף שאין לנו, אין בעייה.

הגברת עוזרת הניעה עם שחר, והעירה אותי משנתי הנעימה. פתחתי את הדלת לדמות תמירה וחמורת סבר (סוב, מי רוצה לחייך כשלפניו ארבע שעות עבודת כפיים?), שדרשה קפוצ'ינו חזק לפני שמתחילים. הראתי לה את המכונה, לא עזר, אז הכנתי לה בעצמי קפה, ופרשתי בשיא לחדר.
אחרי כחצי שעה, שלא שמעתי ירישרוש בבית, יצאתי על בהונות ומצאתי את חמורת הסבר מעלעלת בעיתוני הבוקר. בחורה חרוצה, אין מה לומר, את הקפוצ'ינו השני היא כבר עשתה לעמרי לבד.
הזזתי בחן את הדלי, הסמרטוטים וחומרי הניקוי שמאיר הציג לראווה במטבח (בחיים לא ידעתי שיש לנו ארון מיוחד בשביל זה!), ותליתי בה מבט ביישני.
קיבלתי בחזרה מבט שואל ומתריס, ושוב ברחתי לחדר. עשיתי מלא רעשים של כאילו אני עובדת או משהו, כדי להזין את מוסר העבודה הגלובלי בבית.

בסביבות עשר וחצי יצאתי שוב לסלון, כי פתאום באה לי מחשבה שזו בכלל לא העזרת החדשה. אולי זו סתם שכנה לא מוכרת שקפצה לביקור, ומתפלאת למה אני לא מצטרפת אליה לקפה? אז ליתר בטחון, הצטרפתי אליה לקפה.
מסתבר, שזו בכל זאת הייתה העוזרת, כי שמעתי רחש מוכר שאני מייחסת למכונת הכביסה. חמורת הסבר גם הזיזה את הספה ממקומה, והייתה שקועה בעניין באחורות שהיא מצאה מאחוריה (כל כך שמחתי שהיא מצאה את הצמיד שלי, שאפילו לא הוכחתי אותה כשצפיתי בה מכניסה אותו לכיס הסינר החינני שמאיר קנה לה). רציתי להגיד לה שיותר חוף הכלים, הסירים והשטיחים, אבל, האמת, די פחדתי ממנה.
לא דיברנו הרבה באותו יום, חוץ מאותו משפט שנאמר בנימה מקפיאה דם, בו היא הוכיחה אותי על כך שאני מסתגרת בחדר ולא נותנת לה לנקות אותו.
תבינו, צמיד וטבעת ליום זה הרבה, לא! והחדר שלי מלא בדברים כייפים שאני עדין רוצה!
בתום יום העבודה המתיש לשתינו (יש לכם מושג כמה אנרגיה מתבזבזת על נסיות להיראות עסוקה ולא לעשות כלום! כי עכשיו כשהתקבלה ההוראה לפתוח דלתות, אני לא יכולה סתם להישתרע על המיטה שלי ולבהות בתיקרה, בעוד היא עובדת בפרך. לא נעים). אם כן, בתום יום העבודה, הושטתי לה את השטרות וניפרדנו בידידות.

הבית נראה נורא, אז ברחתי לקפה השכונתי עם ידידה, והרגשתי נורא בורגנית ועם זאת איכית, כזו שמתלוננת באזני החברות על העוזרת שלה.

מאיר חזר הביתה, וניקה תוך שלוש שעות את הבלגן, אבל הוא לא העז להתלונן. רצה עוזרת! יש עוזרת.
כלומר, אמרתי לה לא לבוא יותר, ואמרתי לו שהיא כן ממשיכה לבוא. במשכורת שלה אני קונה לי קישקושים והולכת למספרת.
מאיר לא מרגיש בהבדל.
אני עדיין הולכת לישון בבית לא נקי, אבל לעומת זאת, כרגע גם המצפון שלי לא כל כך נקי...

היי חברים, רבים מכם כתבתם לי באימייל שהייתם רוצים שגם המשפחה והידידים שלכם, שלא קוראים עברית, יקראו אותי, ושאלתם מה דעתי לנסות לכתוב באנגלית. קודם כל - תודה, ושנית, החלטתי להרים את הכפפה. מעכשיו, הטור יפורסם אחת לחודש, ובאנגלית. סי יו!

Federation faces campaign shortfall

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — UJA Federation of Hamilton fears it will have to reduce funding to its beneficiary agencies at a time when they need help more than ever.

Like Jewish federations across Canada and the United States, Hamilton has experienced a decrease in campaign contributions this year. And even prior to the current economic downturn, almost one in five Jews in Hamilton, about 800 people, were living in poverty – among the highest of any Jewish community in Canada. As well, 22 per cent of Jewish children in the community were poor.

Incoming Hamilton UJA president Larry Levin says donations are down about 10 per cent this year.

"The general economic climate made it difficult for a lot of people to have it business as usual," Levin said, adding that interest on investments has also been lower than expected.

Last year, the UJA campaign raised $1.14 million, and organizers had been hoping to raise $1.5 million this year, an 18 per cent increase that was set before the scale of the downturn became evident.

But the campaign has only raised about $1 million so far, and organizers are seeking to raise an additional $150,000 in a top-up drive, said Christine Nusca, assistant campaign director.

"Some donors went above and beyond, and some weren't able to. We understand," Levin said. "But we expect more families to be in need this year, and we want to be prepared to offer our support at their time of need."

Carol Krames, director of Hamilton Jewish Social Services, says more people are using the kosher food bank and unemployment is rising.

"I keep careful records of the people I have resettled over the past 32 years. Of the newcomers from Israel, South America, Europe and the former Soviet Union, between one-third to one-quarter have at least one member of the family who has lost their job. In some families, it is both husband and wife. This is not just in Hamilton, but in many of the smaller cities across Canada," she said.

"We also have an increase in people coming from other countries claiming refugee status, which tells us that things are so difficult in their native country they are hoping for a better life here. Let's all hope they are not disappointed."

Locally, the federation supports Jewish Social Services, including the food bank, as well as the Jewish Community Centre, Hamilton's Jewish day and afternoon schools, the Midrasha High School, McMaster University Jewish Students Association and the Hamilton Jewish News.

The campaign committee is asking anyone who has not donated to consider doing so, and for those who have to give an additional 10 per cent.

"For some of us, this is small, but it will make an enormous difference to those who need it," Levin said. "What a wonderful opportunity to be able to share our good fortune with those less fortunate."

To donate, call Nusca at 905-648-0605, ext. 306.

FAT AND CELLULITE REDUCTION BREAKTHROUGH

Dr. Rochelle Schwartz & Dr. Sharla Lichtman are excited to introduce an innovative technology that offers non-surgical face lifts, fat & inch loss reduction and body contouring. The most advanced radio frequency (RF) device in the cosmetic market today is an Israeli-made machine powered by unique TriPollar RF technology. The Apollo, distributed by Sigmacon, has found incredible success in 55 countries across the globe and Genesis Wellness is proud to be introducing it into their North Toronto Aesthetic Clinic.

The Apollo reduces fat and cellulite, tightens skin and generates new collagen in a pain-free, non-invasive, no downtime procedure that has immediate and long-term results. It can treat virtually any body area quickly and with instant improvement. The Apollo has been well researched and praised by international doctors and is leading the way for affordable, simple cosmetic procedures. Whether it is crow's feet, saggy skin from weight loss or pregnancy, a stubborn area of fat or a double chin, the Apollo has shown significant results. With a facial treatment only 30 minutes, this simple 'walk-in, walk-out' procedure allows you to immediately return to your daily routine. The process is safe, effective and turns back the clock.

Obituary

Former editor of Winnipeg newspaper dies suddenly

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Matt Bellan, who had been the longtime editor and co-owner of the Jewish Post & News, died suddenly last week at age 58 after having retired a little more than four months ago.

"Matt was found dead in the swimming pool of his apartment building Tuesday morning [April 13]... he used to swim regularly, and his body had been in the pool overnight before he was found," said his brother Bernie Bellan, business manager and co-owner of the Jewish Post & News.

Bellan was notified of his brother Matt's "shocking" death by police on the morning of April 14.

Matt Bellan had been diagnosed with diabetes early in life.

"He had a history of diabetic seizures, and he died most likely of a heart attack or a diabetic seizure," said his brother, who noted that an autopsy was performed.

"The coroner's office has told us [the family] that he had a 75 per cent blockage in an artery," Bernie Bellan said.

On the day he died, Bellan, who continued as an occasional writer for the Jewish Post & News, attended a Passover luncheon put on by the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University and appeared to be well.

Bellan, who especially liked to read, had been enjoying the newfound time he had to do so since his retirement as editor.

Bellan began editing the Jewish Post & News in 1982 after working for the Regina Leader-Post.

Tove Silver, office manager at the Jewish Post & News since 1989, remembers Bellan as a "very generous" man.

"My son-in-law had a liver transplant in 2007 when he was 30 years old. Matt kept asking about him and even gave them [him and her daughter] a little money to help them out," Silver said.

"Matt also used to help a blind women out by giving her rides and helping her regularly," she said.

But she noted that Bellan had not been well. "It was difficult for him [Matt] to control his diabetes," Silver said.

"He was very devoted to the newspaper when he was editor... and he used to like covering the arts, including many plays and concerts in the [Jewish] community," she added.

"Matt will be remembered for his distinguished service to our local Jewish community," Alan Yusim, midwest region director of B'nai Brith Canada, wrote to Bernie Bellan and the Jewish Post & News on learning of Matt's death.

Matt Bellan

"He was a passionate and valuable contributor to the Jewish and greater communities," wrote Jeff Morry, senior programmer for the Asper Foundation.

Matt, who was born and raised in Winnipeg, was openly gay and left behind his partner of more than 30 years, Guy Frobisher.

Bernie Bellan said Frobisher "was quite shaken up by Matt's death when notified on Tuesday morning."

Bellan said his brother was determined to give the Jewish Post & News an online presence, and he took courses in web design and singlehandedly created and maintained the paper's website.

"Matt would do this every Wednesday afternoon when the paper was published, and it's something I will have to take over," Bellan said. He added that his brother will also be remembered as a "very talented reporter" and observer of Jewish life.

In addition to brother Bernie, Bellan is survived by two sisters, Judi Waldman in Winnipeg and Ruth Cooperstock in Victoria.

Ahmadinejad addresses Durban II opening

"What were the root causes of the U.S. attacks against Iraq or invasion of Afghanistan? The Iraqi people have suffered enormous losses," the Iranian president said. "Wasn't the military action against Iraq planned by the Zionists… in the U.S. administration, in complicity with the arms manufacturing companies?

"The Security Council made it possible for that illegitimate government to be set up," Ahmadinejad said. "For 60 years, this government was supported by the world. Many western countries say they are fighting racism, but in fact support it with occupation, bombings and crimes committed in Gaza. These countries support the criminals."

A wigged protester shouting, "Racist! racist!" threw a soft red object, which may have been a clown's nose, at Ahmadinejad, hitting the podium and interrupting his speech.

Ahmadinejad's speech came as Israel prepared to mark Yom Hashoah, its own Holocaust Remembrance Day. The Iranian leader has repeatedly claimed the Holocaust never happened and has called for Israel's destruction.

Swiss President Hans-Rudolf Merz met Ahmadinejad upon the latter's arrival in Geneva on Sunday, a day before the Durban II conference was to convene. Merz had declared he planned to challenge the Iranian leader about his views on the Holocaust and Israel.

U.S. President Barack Obama

Merz also described the presence of Ahmadinejad as a good chance to discuss ways to mature bilateral ties, as well as regional and international co-operation, according to the Iranian Student News Agency.

Israel said it was recalling its ambassador to Switzerland on Monday in protest.

Israeli President Shimon Peres said in a statement he was "deeply hurt and ashamed" that Ahmadinejad was invited to speak precisely on Holocaust Remembrance Day.

"There must be a limit, even to the neutrality of Switzerland. Today is the day? This is the man to speak? This is the outlook for the future?" Peres said. "I don't want to speak too much about Iran. But in Iran, people are hanged because they are suspected of God knows what – nothing. There is a centre of hate, of blood, of terror."

Meanwhile, U.S. President Barack Obama explained the decision to keep the United States away from the review conference as not wishing to put "an imprimatur on something we just don't believe."

A statement issued Saturday by the State Department said it was too late to address critical problems with the anti-racism forum, and its decision not to attend was final. The statement commended conference organizers for additional improvements to a draft outcome document that removed explicit criticisms of Israel, but said the document remained unacceptable because it endorsed the 2001 Durban Conference, which singled out Israel for criticism.

The new document's inclusion of the endorsement, which does not specify Israel or the Palestinians, "has the same effect as inserting that original text into the current document and re-adopting it."

Answering a question at a news conference in Trinidad & Tobago about the U.S. decision to boycott the Durban review conference, Obama noted that the initial Durban conference in 2001, which was supposed to be about racism, instead "became a session through which folks expressed antagonism toward Israel in ways that were oftentimes completely hypocritical and counterproductive.

"We expressed in the run-up to this conference our concerns that if you adopted all the language from 2001, that's not something we could sign up for," Obama said. "If you're incorporating a previous conference we weren't involved with that raised a whole set of objectionable provisions, it wouldn't be worth it to participate because we couldn't get past that previous issue."

He added that if there had been a "clean start, fresh start," the United States would have been "happy to go."

Obama said he does believe in the United Nations and its ability to be an "effective forum" to deal with transnational conflicts, noting that the United States is pursuing a seat on the UN Human Rights Council for the first time. He also said he told UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon he would be happy to work with the organization after the Durban conference "to see if we can move forward on some of these steps" and "partner with other countries to reduce discrimination."

Irwin Cotler

The American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) applauded the decision by the United States not to attend.

"President Obama's decision not to send U.S. representation to the event is the right thing to do and underscores America's unstinting commitment to combating intolerance and racism in all its forms and in all settings," AIPAC said in a statement.

However, Ban Ki-moon criticized western nations for boycotting the conference, saying he was "profoundly disappointed."

"Some nations, who by rights should be helping to forge a path to a better future, are not here," the secretary general said as he opened the five-day meeting.

"I deeply regret that some have chosen to stand aside. I hope they will not do so for long," Ban added, before holding his own meeting with Ahmadinejad.

Navi Pillay, the UN high commissioner for human rights, said in a news release Sunday she deeply regretted the decision by the United States not to attend the anti-racism review conference. She urged other states to maintain their commitment to the draft outcome document that was completed last Friday.

"I am shocked and deeply disappointed by the United States' decision not to attend a conference that aims to combat racism, xenophobia, racial discrimination and other forms of intolerance worldwide," Pillay said. "A handful of states have permitted one or two issues to dominate their approach to this issue, allowing them to outweigh the concerns of numerous groups of people that suffer racism and similar forms of intolerance to a pernicious and life-damaging degree on a daily basis all across the world, in both developed and developing countries. These are truly global issues, and it is essential that they are discussed at a global level, however sensitive and difficult they may be.

"Some media have interpreted the U.S. withdrawal as based on the continued retention of language on defamation of religion and anti-Semitism in the outcome document, when, in fact, no such language exists in the text adopted last week," Pillay noted. "In addition, the draft outcome document clearly states that 'the Holocaust must never be forgotten' and deplores all forms of racism including Islamophobia and anti-Semitism."

She pointed out that in this respect it reflects the original 2001 Durban Declaration and Program of Action.

"I fail to see why, given that the Middle East is not mentioned in this document, politics related to the Middle East continue to intrude into the process," she said.

Responding to U.S. concerns that the draft document incorporates the final document from the 2001 Durban conference, Pillay said, "I believe that difficulty could have been overcome. It would have been possible to make it clear in a footnote that the United States had not affirmed the original document and therefore is not in a position to reaffirm it, which is a routine practice in multilateral negotiations to enable consensus-building while allowing for individual positions to be expressed.

"And then we could have all moved on together and put the problems of 2001 behind us."

Israel sent a delegation to Geneva to publicly protest Durban II. As part of their campaign, the Israelis planned to organize demonstrations and distribute materials on human rights violations in Iran – with particular emphasis on public executions and violence against women.

The campaign was overseen by Israel ambassador to Geneva Ronnie Lashno-Yaar, assisted by Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz, Nobel Prize laureate Elie Weisel and film actor Jon Voight. A special media room is providing immediate responses to anti-Israeli statements.

On Sunday, Dershowitz was escorted by Swiss federal agents away from the hotel where Ahmadinejad and Merz were meeting, after he declared plans to challenge the Iranian leader about his views on the Holocaust and Israel.

In other developments, Canadian MP Irwin Cotler, the former minister of justice and attorney general, denounced Ahmadinejad's presence at the Durban review conference.

"It makes a mockery of the case and cause of human rights for the review conference – which is supposed to be dedicated to the struggle against racism and for human rights – to be welcoming President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran, who shames the cause of human rights as he shames the great civilization of Iran and its people."

Cotler said Ahmadinejad incites hatred and genocide in violation of the Genocide Convention's prohibition; is engaged in the massive repression of the rights of his own people – particularly the Baha'i religious minority; pursues the most destructive of weaponry in violation of UN Security Council resolutions; is complicit in crimes against humanity through genocidal terrorist proxies; and has used the podium of the UN General Assembly to invoke classic anti-Semitic tropes reminiscent of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

"A person who shames the cause of human rights does not deserve to be a welcome guest at a human rights conference," Cotler continued.

Natan Sharansky gets nod to head Jewish Agency

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minster Benjamin Netanyahu named former minister Natan Sharansky as his candidate for chairman of the Jewish Agency, the prime minister's office said Saturday.

Natan Sharansky

Netanyahu intends to recommend Sharansky for the position to the Jewish Agency's board of trustees. Until a few months ago, the job was filled by Zeev Bielsky, currently a Kadima MK.

A former Soviet Refusenik, the 61-year-old Sharansky founded the Yisrael Baaliyah party and served as trade and industry minister during Netanyahu's first stint as prime minister. Sharansky was also minister of the interior in Ehud Barak's government and deputy prime minister and housing minister under Ariel Sharon.

In the 2006 elections, Sharansky ran as part of the Likud party, but withdrew from political life a few months after being elected.

Sharansky, considered a confidante of Netanyahu, has won the U.S. Presidential Medal of Freedom for his struggles for human rights and has headed the Institute for Strategic Studies at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem.

Italian Jews lend hand after quake

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ROME — Italian Jews and Holocaust survivors are rushing to aid communities that sheltered them during World War II and were hit by last week's devastating earthquake.

A delegation of some 20 elderly survivors and their descendants, as well as Jewish community leaders, roamed the shattered countryside of central Italy on Monday, looking for their former saviours, who are now living in tent camps.

They offered everything from gym shoes to summer camps for children.

"I wouldn't be here if it weren't for these people," said Alberto Di Consiglio, whose parents were sheltered in the small hamlet of Fossa during the war. "We have to help them."

More than 100 tent cities have been built around L'Aquila and the 26 towns and villages affected by the 6.3-magnitude quake that struck central Italy on April 6. The temblor killed 294 people and displaced another 55,000.

In the chaos of the relief efforts, Jews who had been sheltered in the area during the war lost touch with their one-time rescuers, many of whom are simple farmers with no cellphones.

At least five Jewish families – about 30 people – took shelter in the small mountainside hamlets of Fossa and Casentino from mid-1943 until the arrival of the Allies a year later, survivors said.

In one tent, Di Consiglio managed to find Nello De Bernardinis, 74, the son of the couple who sheltered Di Consiglio's father and eight other relatives during the war.

"It was a great emotion, It's so painful that such righteous people should suffer like this and live in a tent," Di Consiglio said.

De Bernardinis said he was fine for the moment and greatly appreciated the Jewish community's checking in on him and his family. He said, however, that it would be useful to have help during harvest time, and Di Consiglio promised his whole family would come.

Riccardo Pacifici, the head of Rome's Jewish community, said he was working to get recognition from Jerusalem's Yad Vashem Holocaust museum and memorial for people like De Bernardinis and others who sheltered Roman Jews. The memorial bestows a special honour on those who saved Jews during World War II.

Irena Steinfeldt, director of the Righteous Among the Nations department at Yad Vashem, said the museum was not familiar with the stories of Fossa and Casentino. She urged the Jewish families involved to come forward so that the people who saved them could be recognized.

"We have not heard these stories, and we want to hear these stories," Steinfeldt said. "There are still people who haven't approached us and haven't spoken, and I would be happy if the families contacted Yad Vashem and told us."

Other stories of Jews being saved in the same area were recorded, she said, usually involving Jews who fled from Rome to nearby villages. In one town, Tagliacozzo Alto, a priest named Don Gaetano Tantalo took in the Orvieto family in the spring of 1944, even preparing a traditional Passover meal for them, she said. He was recognized by Yad Vashem in 1978.

Jews of Europe had great growth potential

he writes: "This was the destruction of a generation, and what we are lacking now is not only that generation, it is their children and their children."

According to Della Pergola, while the birth rate of the Jewish population outside Israel is relatively low, the young Jewish population of eastern Europe had great potential for growth.

"What would happen if there were another 10 million Jews in eastern Europe? It raises questions that are like science fiction – for example, would the State of Israel have come into being?"

Della Pergola says another demographic outcome of the Holocaust has been the lower relative number of Jews in the world. "At present, the percentage of Jews in the world is constantly in decline. Before the Holocaust, the rate was eight Jews per 1,000 people in the world. Today it is two per 1,000."

Della Pergola also notes in the article that various estimates put the number of Jews killed in the Holocaust at between 5.6 and 5.9 million, and that part of the problem in pinpointing the number lies in the question of "who is a Jew," since some of those killed converted to Christianity before the Holocaust or were partly Jewish.

Counter-conference held in New York

"Rather, such a person – who massively oppresses the rights of his own people – belongs in the docket of the accused."

The Jerusalem-based NGO Monitor, which publicizes material on distortions of human rights issues in the Arab-Israeli conflict, said Ahmadinejad's participation at an anti-racism conference "will further expose the failure of Durban II as a genuine human rights conference."

Gerald Steinberg, NGO Monitor's executive director, said: "The voices of morality which have worked to prevent another human rights disaster in the Durban framework have had a significant impact. In contrast, biased NGOs that promote this demonization have lost influence. The presence of Ahmadinejad and the focus on Iran's gross violations of human rights will further expose the moral bankruptcy of those working for a repeat of the Durban Conference in 2001."

In other developments, Canadian Senator Jerry Grafstein said a "counter-conference" in New York City, which will coincide with the Geneva-based review conference, could serve as "a corrective to Durban II and the UN conference that appears to be a rerun of the distorted anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism of the 2001 meeting."

Grafstein said the counter-conference on racism and discrimination could also provide an intellectual launching pad to a completely new organization that would bring together democracies outside the UN framework.

U.S. president Ronald Reagan suggested an association of democracies, and president Bill Clinton built on that, but work toward a council of democracies is being done incrementally and in small steps, Grafstein said.

The United Nations has failed in one of its missions, that of promoting human rights, Grafstein added. This can be seen in the Durban II conference, which was organized in part by such human rights violators as Iran, Cuba and Libya. A council of democracies would share a common set of principles that current UN member do not share, he said.

The Durban II counter-conference is sponsored by the American Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists, along with about two dozen other, mostly Jewish, organizations.

The five-day Durban Review Conference in Geneva is intended to take stock of international efforts to combat intolerance since the 2001 World Conference Against Racism in Durban, which saw the United States and Israel walk out over claims of anti-Semitism.

A draft declaration circulated earlier this year blamed Israel for the entire Middle East conflict, while human rights violations in Muslim countries were largely ignored. Negotiators in Geneva said on Friday that most western and Muslim states had agreed to a revised declaration removing all references to Israel and the Middle East. But diplomats say Middle Eastern nations insisted that a clause about the incitement of religious hatred remain in the text, which many western countries see as a curtailment of free speech.

Mossad tip led to capture of Hezbollah cell in Sinai

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Foreign intelligence services – including Israel's Mossad – have provided Egyptian authorities with intelligence that contributed to the uncovering of a Hezbollah-run terrorist ring and led to the arrest of dozens of suspects.

Meanwhile, Egyptian sources upped the tone of the charges against Hezbollah on April 13 by claiming that the aim of the underground activity was not limited to plans for terrorist attacks against tourist areas frequented by foreigners, but also against targets in the Suez canal.

Foreign intelligence services, including the Mossad and the CIA, contributed information to Egypt that led to the uncovering of the Hezbollah terror cell in that country, Philippe Vasset, editor of Intelligence Online told Ha'aretz.

The online biweekly reported that the Egyptian security forces operated on the basis of intelligence "provided to them by several foreign intelligence services."

According to the report, the head of the ring operating in Egypt, Lebanese citizen Sami Shihab, had been in touch for some time with a special branch of Hezbollah. The report also states that following the assassination of Hezbollah's terrorist mastermind Imad Mughniyeh more than a year ago in Damascus, the special branch has been led jointly by three senior operatives: Nawaf al-Mussawi, Wafic Safa and Sheikh Ali Dugmush. The three operate in co-ordination with General Faisal Bagherzadeh, head of Iran's Revolutionary Guard mission to Lebanon.

Western sources told Ha'aretz that in recent years, co-operation between the intelligence services of a number of western countries has intensified with regard to Iran. Israel is a leading player in this co-operation.

Tehran's nuclear program and its role in international terrorism are both concerns of the intelligence services.

Iran's intelligence and security service, and Al-Quds, an elite unit of the Revolutionary Guard whose mission is to assist Shiite militias and organizations throughout the world, have deployed "sleeper cells" of agents, who are activated according to need. In some cases, the cells were activated directly by Iranian agents, while in other cases Hezbollah was used, especially through a special branch originally set up by Mughniyeh.

The CIA, Mossad, Britain's MI6, the German BND and other intelligence services – like those of Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan who have suffered attacks by terrorist cells operated by Iran – have stepped up collaboration, information sharing and joint assessments. Egypt's chief of intelligence, General Omar Suleiman, is a frequent visitor to Israel and the doors of his counterparts in Israel are always open, as are those of the Prime Minister's Bureau.

Security sources in Israel have issued warnings on a number of occasions that Hezbollah will try to avenge the killing of Mughniyeh, which it blames on Mossad agents, thereby fulfilling a promise made publicly by Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah. In response to these concerns, Israeli diplomatic missions were placed on high alert on a number of occasions, and the London Times reported that several weeks ago an attempt against an Israeli target in Baku, Azerbaijan, was foiled.

Meanwhile, Egyptian security sources said that the Hezbollah agents arrested in Egypt had planned a series of terrorist attacks against tourist sites in Sinai where Israeli and western tourists vacation. However, the Egyptian sources also noted that the Suez Canal was a target of the ring – possibly one of the larger ships passing through the strategic waterway.

> Terrorists had planned attacks against tourists

Incapacitating a large ship in the canal would have had a serious impact on the country's economy, as the canal is a major source of revenues for the local economy, worth several billion dollars a year. An attack on the Suez Canal and tourist sites in the country would have undermined the Egyptian economy sufficiently to destabilize the standing of the regime in the Arab world.

A senior Egyptian source told Ha'aretz that "Egypt will take active measures against anyone who threatens its national security. We will not allow anyone to do this: Hezbollah, Iran or others. They sought to strike at the national security of Egypt, but luckily we stopped them and uncovered their plot."

The same source also said that "it is not unlikely that Hezbollah sought to strike at the Egyptian regime. They wanted to undermine our position in the region, and harm our economy and our ties with countries in the area."

Senior Israeli security sources said yesterday that Hezbollah appears to have been aiming to strike at the regime of Egyptian leader Hosni Mubarak. They note that the tourist sites where Israelis visit were a secondary target for the group. The same sources assessed that Mubarak is now fully aware of the severity of the threat posed to Egypt's security. "Mubarak understands that Iran has turned Egypt and Sinai into a forward base of operations. It is no wonder he is concerned," a senior source said.

The uncovering of the ring will result in greater understanding in Egypt of Israel's considerations, however, no one should expect an immediate improvement in Egyptian efforts to counter arms smuggling into the Gaza Strip, the same source said.

Israel always the enemy

Hamas leaders made their first appearances at public events since Israel's Gaza war on Friday, signalling defiance of rival Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas as he discussed peace prospects with a U.S. envoy. "We cannot, we will not, and we will never recognize the enemy in any way, shape or form," Mahmoud Zahar, one of the two leaders, said in a mosque sermon broadcast on the Islamist movement's radio station.

Recognize Israel, first: Bibi

The Palestinians should recognize Israel as a Jewish state before Israel commits to peace talks, Benjamin Netanyahu said. "Israel expects the Palestinians to first recognize Israel as a Jewish state before talking about two states for two peoples," Israel's prime minister told George Mitchell, U.S. President Barack Obama's Mideast envoy, during an April 16 meeting in Jerusalem, a senior official in Netanyahu's office told Israeli media. In meetings with Israeli officials, Mitchell said U.S. policy favours the creation of a Palestinian state. Mitchell met Israel's foreign minister, Avigdor Lieberman on April 16 after a meeting with President Shimon Peres and an April 15 meeting with Defence Minister Ehud Barak. Mitchell also met opposition leader Tzipi Livni.

No talking to Lieberman

Egypt's foreign minister said his country won't deal with Israel's foreign minister, Avigdor Lieberman. Ahmed Abul Gheit said in an interview with Russia Today television that his country would work with Israel and any of its proposals, but not through Lieberman. "Of course he will not visit Cairo as long as his positions remain unchanged," Gheit added. Last year during a Knesset session, Lieberman said Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak could "go to hell" if he was not interested in visiting Israel. Lieberman backtracked during a speech at a ceremony earlier this month marking the start of his tenure in office, when he said he would like to visit Egypt and welcomed its leaders to Israel, saying Egypt is key to achieving regional stability.

Peres dismisses Iran speculation

President Shimon Peres on April 16 dismissed speculations that Israel is planning to attack Iran over its contentious nuclear program. Peres told visiting U.S. special Mideast envoy George Mitchell that the key to containing Iran's nuclear ambitions would not be found in a military realm. "All the talk about a possible attack by Israel on Iran is not true," Peres said. "The solution in Iran is not military." He said that progress with Iran depended on international co-operation and exploring whether dialogue presented a real opportunity or if Tehran was just stalling, according to a statement from Peres' office.

IAF strikes in Gaza

The Israeli Air Force hit a house in Gaza that was rigged with explosives a day after a Qassam rocket was fired on southern Israel. The attack took place April 16 as U.S. President Barack Obama's Mideast envoy, George Mitchell, was meeting with Israeli military Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi. It was Israel's first strike on Gaza in more than a month. The Qassam fired April 15 was the first attack on southern Israel in two weeks.

RABBI PAYSACH KROHN
"It's all in the Jewish name"
The wisdom, humour and significance of choosing a Jewish name for our children
Names in Judaism are not merely monikers to refer to someone. They are the definition of one's personality and essence. The Ariz'l wrote that parents are imbued with a 'Ruach hakodesh' when they choose names for their children. Choosing names often leads to conflict in a family. Who has the right to name? Is there a bad mazel in naming after someone who died young? Rabbi Paysach Krohn has had great experience in helping families choose appropriate names for their children.

Novel draws on author's legal background

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Toronto Mayor David Miller and Robert Rotenberg at Toronto City Hall in March. [David Israelson photo]

How fitting that Robert Rotenberg's first book, Old City Hall (Touchstone, 2009), a legal thriller set in Toronto, was released the very week the city marked its 175th anniversary.

Old City Hall celebrates Toronto. Its colourful characters are cut from Toronto's multicultural fabric. And iconic city landmarks like Nathan Phillips Square, the Don Jail and, of course, Old City Hall, are interwoven into an intricate whodunit yarn.

The prominence of Toronto in this book may explain why Rotenberg, a criminal lawyer, was included in the city's 175th anniversary festivities in early March. He was invited to read at the library at City Hall. Turns out Mayor David Miller is a big fan.

"I finished the reading," Rotenberg recounts, "and suddenly I heard Mayor Miller yelling to the crowd, 'You got to read this book!' It was a magical moment."

Within weeks of its release in March, the book made Maclean's magazine's and the Globe and Mail's lists of the top 10 bestselling books in the country.

It's being translated into eight languages, audio book and large print format rights have been sold and Rotenberg just finished the sequel.

The Toronto-born author says it's all very exciting, but his proudest moment was at the book launch, sharing his literary success with his father, Dr. Cyril Rotenberg, who, sadly, died a few weeks after this interview.

"I said, 'Dad, our name will be known all around the world.' To put the book in his hand was the best part of the whole thing."

This filial sensitivity is paralleled in the character of Detective Ari Greene, the fictional Jewish protagonist of Old City Hall. Greene is also very attentive to his father, but Rotenberg says there's no autobiographical connection. "I'm enjoying getting to know him."

Greene is the son of a Holocaust survivor, which is not the writer's background. However, Rotenberg says many of his childhood friends' parents were survivors. Greene's father is a composite of these people. "Although he's experienced enormous tragedy, he's not a tragic person. He's funny. He's sarcastic. He's not a one-dimensional character."

Inside Hana's Suitcase director brings a message of hope

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Inside Hana's Suitcase, the Holocaust documentary by director/producer Larry Weinstein, makes its world première on the opening night of Toronto's Hot Docs Festival.

Based on Karen Levine's award-winning book Hana's Suitcase, Weinstein's film, to be screened April 30, tells the remarkable story of how a suitcase left by young Auschwitz victim Hana Brady forever changes the lives of her brother, George Brady, in Toronto, and Holocaust educator Fumiko Ishioka in Tokyo.

At the Victoria Film Festival, where the documentary screened as a work in progress and won the Canwest Award for best documentary, the response to it and to Brady's guest appearance was overwhelming.

"The audience broke into a spontaneous standing ovation for George and his daughter, Lara," Weinstein said in an interview at his downtown Rhombus Media office. "One can't help but fall in love with George in watching the film, and feeling incredible empathy for him. When he's sad, it's heart-breaking because he's a brave person who doesn't wallow in sadness. They adored him, and Lara too."

Jindriška Hanušová as young Hana and Daniel Hájek as George in Larry Weinstein's new film Inside Hana's Suitcase.

Weinstein is known for creating award-winning, avant-garde documentaries about prolific composer-musicians, including September Songs: The Music of Kurt Weill, Ravel's Brain, Beethoven's Hair, Mozartballs and Toscanini: In His Own Words. This is his first non-music film in 25 years.

"I hadn't thought about making a film devoted to the Holocaust theme, but Hana's Suitcase was such a moving book," Weinstein said. "I knew that George and Fumiko were living, real characters, and I became interested in creating another cross between documentary and drama."

What makes this film inspiring are the heroes – Ishioka who used the suitcase to educate children in Tokyo about religious tolerance and George and Lara Brady who travel the world with the same goal of educating children about the Holocaust.

But "the film's not just about educating people on the Holocaust, which is always important," Weinstein said. "It's about a bigger subject – we have to have empathy for each other as human beings or there will be nothing left in the end."

Brady's story first appeared in a CJN article in 2001. It immediately caught the imagination of author Karen Levine, who made it into an award-winning radio documentary and then wrote the book. Since then, the suitcase story has spawned Joe Schlesinger's documentary Odyssey of Hope: Hana's Suitcase, and Emil Sher's play, Hana's Suitcase, also both award-winners.

Through dream-like dramatic recreations, Weinstein presents George Brady's life in his small Czech town and the Theresienstadt and Auschwitz concentration camps. The story unfolds as child storytellers from Canada, the Czech Republic and Japan express Brady's emotions and compassionately relate his situation to theirs.

Creatively, Weinstein weaves in interviews, animation and photos hidden by Brady during the war, taking viewers back to Brady's earlier days and forward to Tokyo for Ishioka's quest to find the suitcase's owner.

Spiritual and moving, the music was written by people who had similar experiences to those of Hana and George – three from Terezin: Hans Krasa, Gideon Klein and Pavel Haas; and two others: anti-fascist Czech composer Bohuslav Martinu and German composer Karl Amadeus Hartmann, the only musician Weinstein knows of who was actively anti-fascist under Adolf Hitler.

Plans for the film include a theatrical release and CBC broadcasts.

The April 30 screening is at the Winter Garden Theatre at 9:30 p.m. It screens again on May 3 at 1:30 p.m.at the Isabel Bader Theatre.

Hot Docs film festival has something for everybody

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The world's biggest documentary film festival, Hot Docs, has something for everybody at this year's edition, the 16th, which runs in Toronto from April 30 to May 10. [www.hotdocs.ca]

A preview:

Larry Weinstein's Inside Hana's Suitcase, blending factual narrative with dramatizations, is a story of heartbreak and hope.

Czech-born Jew George Brady and his younger sister, Hana, form the core of this movie, which is co-presented by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

George and Hana, from the town of Nove Mesto, had what seems like an idyllic childhood. But after Germany occupied Czechoslovakia in 1939, their parents were arrested and eventually murdered by the Nazis. Shorn of a mother and a father, they were taken care of by relatives.

In 1942, they were deported to the Theresienstadt concentration camp, near Prague. He was 13 and she was 10. They were then shipped to Auschwitz, where he survived, but she perished.

This touching 90-minute movie, set in the Czech Republic, Japan and Canada, fleshes out their lives through the prism of Canadian and Japanese school projects and raises awareness of the dangers of intolerance and hatred.

Hana's life, tragically cut so short, unfolds as the director of the Holocaust Education and Resource Centre in Tokyo – a sensitive woman dedicated to fighting racism and promoting understanding – helps pupils solve a mystery about the ownership of a battered suitcase from Auschwitz.

By turns sombre and uplifting, Inside Hana's Suitcase is a well told tale. It will be screened on Thursday, April 30, at 9:30 p.m. at the Winter Garden Theatre and on Sunday, May 3, at 1:30 p.m. at the Isabel Bader Theatre.

Two Israeli soldiers, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, were kidnapped by Hezbollah as they patrolled the Lebanese border on July 12, 2006. In response, Israel attacked Lebanon, precipitating a 34-day war.

Chronicle of a Kidnap, by Nurit Kedar, focuses on efforts by Goldwasser's wife, Karnit, to rally Israeli and international support for his release.

Unfortunately, her work was in vain, since Goldwasser was probably killed when his armoured personnel carrier was ambushed. His remains were returned to Israel in July 2008 in an Israel-Hezbollah prisoner exchange, thus closing a circle of despair.

Kedar's 55-minute film is a portrait of a determined woman who is initially hopeful that she and her beloved husband will be reunited.

She lobbies the Israeli and Russian governments, as well as French President Nicholas Sarkozy. She also travels to the United States to present her case.

Israel's president, Shimon Peres, shrugs his shoulders and is uncharacteristically at a loss for words. Sarkozy briskly pledges to help. A Russian official claims that Goldwasser is still alive.

It is left to a former deputy director of the Mossad to deliver the bad news. He warns Karnit not to be sanguine. He also believes that Israel was not aggressive enough in trying to gain his freedom.

In addition to mining information from a whole host of officials, Kedar talks to Goldwasser's parents and Karnit's father, who all offer different perspectives on the situation.

Chronicle of a Kidnap, a film steeped in sorrow, will be screened on Monday, May 4, at 7:15 p.m. and on Wednesday, May 6, at 12 p.m. at the Royal Ontario Museum and on Sunday, May 10, at 7:15 p.m. at the Cumberland 3 Theatre.

City of Borders, directed by Yun Suh, examines the gay/lesbian scene in Jerusalem through the medium of the Shushan, a bar where Jews and Palestinian Arabs can mingle freely without fear.

Suh interviews the proprietor of the Shushan, who happens to be the first openly gay city councilman in Jerusalem; a drag queen from Ramallah, where homosexuality is strictly frowned upon; a Jewish and Arab lesbian couple who live together; and a gay from a settlement on the outskirts of Jerusalem.

He discovers that the Shushan, teetering on the edge of insolvency, is a place where you can be yourself, and that Jews and Arabs, particularly those from traditional and religious backgrounds, revile homosexuals and lesbians.

"We have to kick them," says a Jewish woman.

An Arab woman adds, "They mar the beauty of Ramallah."

City of Borders will be screened on Sunday, May 3, at 3:45 p.m. at the Cumberland 3 Theatre and on Monday, May 4, at 9:30 p.m. at the Cumberland 2 Theatre.

Worlds collide in Samantha Buck's 21 Below.

Sharon, 28, returns to her mother's middle-class home in Buffalo, N.Y., after learning that her younger sister, Karen, is pregnant yet again.

City of Borders examines the gay/lesbian scene in Jerusalem.

Karen, 21, is the black sheep of the family. Her previous children have been born out of wedlock, and the man who fathered her latest child is an African-American drug dealer.

The plot thickens when Karen finds out that her previous baby, still a toddler, has Tay-Sachs disease – a genetic ailment common to Ashkenazi Jews – and that the child will die before she is three years old.

There is potential in this story, but the script leaves much to be desired and the characters are surprisingly bland.

21 Below will be screened on Wednesday, May 6, at 9:15 p.m. at the Cumberland 3 Theatre and on Friday, May 8, at 4 p.m. at the Royal Ontario Museum.

Simon El Habre's Lebanese film, The One Man Village, is about an unusual man who tends to a herd of dairy cows and a flock of chickens in a bleak, deserted village high in the mountains. It was virtually destroyed during the civil war in Lebanon.

"I love it here," says the man, who awakens to the call of a rooster.

Scheduled to be screened on Friday, May 1, at 9:30 p.m. at the Royal Ontario Museum and on Monday, May 4, at 11:30 a.m. at the Isabel Bader Theatre, The One Man Village observes not only a man who goes against the grain, but a fractured society with an uncertain past and present.

Student filmmaker's web TV parody viewed more than a million times

By VICKY TOBIANAH
Special to The CJN

Richard Stark's dream to tell quirky, character-driven stories led him to Hollywood, where he has pursued his dream to become a director and writer.

Although his career is only beginning, he already has a major success to boast about.

His film The Legend of Neil, a web TV parody based on the video game The Legend of Zelda, was nominated for a 2009 Streamy Award (the web television version of the Academy Awards) for best cinematography.

Stark, 33, was raised in Toronto. He started making short films when he was 11 years old and had made more than 30 by the time he graduated high school.

He recalls playing with his father's large, clunky VHS camera and trying to convince his family and friends to "star" in his movies – family and friends who would later become inspirations for many of the characters in his films.

Despite his passion for storytelling, Stark's interest in science led him to study biology at the University of Toronto.

He figured he would become "another Jewish doctor, a good Jewish professional," Stark said with a laugh. But he soon realized he would not be satisfied unless he was making films.

Devoted to studying "the psychology and dynamics of humans in their relationships," Stark said that his films star people who can bring the truth out of characters and create compelling performances.

"I'm simply fascinated by human behaviour, and this fascination enables me to create worlds the audience has not experienced," he said.

After obtaining a bachelor's degree in science and doing a lot of soul searching, he decided to apply to the University of Southern California's School of Cinema Television master's program.

He got accepted, and without hesitation, he set off for Hollywood on a mission to fulfil his lifelong dream.

He said that he hoped he could become part of the rich tradition of Jewish filmmakers.

The Legend of Neil, about a drunken man who finds himself magically transported into the 1980s video game The Legend of Zelda, was viewed more than one million times.

Stark said he was stunned by the response. It earned the series a permanent spot airing on Atom TV on Comedy Central.

Stark's latest film, My Son's Big Bris, is about a neurotic father dealing with his son's circumcision. The film is a graduate-level thesis that's being produced at the USC film school.

Inspired by Stark's second cousin's brit milah, the film shows the humour and love that can emerge at such big events.

Stark said that Jewish life-cycle events can create drama due to participants who may have strong personalities, but his goal was to portray the way in which a cultural event can unite a family and erode conflicts.

The father in the film, Eugene, is a typical first-time father with some fears. By the end of the film, he has learned that all he needs is confidence in himself and that giving the utmost love to his children will be enough.

Stark has observed the dynamics of family interactions at important events. My Son's Big Bris points to the ways a family can raise a child to help "change the world," he said, despite different beliefs on how that can be accomplished.

During a particularly moving scene, Eugene names his son Chaim, the Hebrew word for life, to emphasize the continuation of the Jewish family. This is an especially poignant moment, since most of Eugene's family perished in the Holocaust.

One of Stark's mentors, Canadian filmmaker George Bloomfield, taught him to create naturalistic performances and encouraged him to discover the one visual moment in his latest film that truly captures the heart of the story.

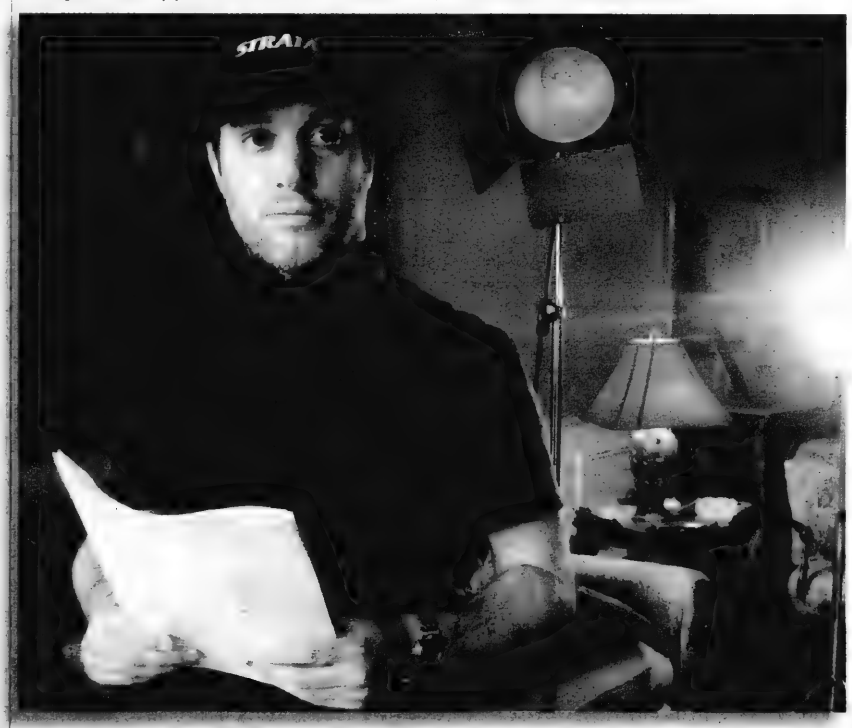
Stark said that moment occurs in My Son's Big Bris when a look that captures the strong bond between them is exchanged between Eugene and his new son.

Although he had to cover the costs of making the film, Stark counts himself lucky to be able to create stories that are meaningful to him.

Stark emphasized the "incredible experience" he undergoes while watching the audience's reactions to his work. It is the most "satisfactory feeling in the world," he said.

Stark added that he wants to continue telling stories that affect people and give them an enlightening perspective on their lives.

For more information about Stark's work, e-mail him at richardestark@live.com.



Toronto native Richard Stark said that his fascination with human behaviour enables him to "create worlds the audience has not experienced" through film.

Soviet project in Birobidzhan 'a sandcastle,' historian says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Birobidzhan, a remote, sparsely populated area of 36,490 square kilometres in Siberia near the Chinese border, was proclaimed a Jewish national district by the Soviet Union in 1928. Six years later, amid rising anti-Semitism in Germany, it was officially designated as the Jewish Autonomous Region.

The establishment of a Jewish homeland in the Soviet Union was intended to achieve several overlapping objectives: to help safeguard its easternmost borders from Chinese or Japanese aggression, to tap Birobidzhan's bountiful natural resources, to move Jews away from the rampant anti-Semitic violence of Ukraine, Belarus and Crimea, to transform Soviet Jewry into a kind of Russian peasantry and to counter the allure of Zionism in Palestine.

Henry Srebrnik

The Canadian Jewish Communist movement, a key ideological component of Canada's left, supported the formation and growth of Birobidzhan and played a role in nurturing its development through an organization known as the Association for Jewish Colonization in the Soviet Union (ICOR).

Founded in the United States in 1924 and popular among first- and second-generation Yiddish-speaking immigrant and working class Jews of eastern European origin, ICOR had a following in Canada as well, mainly in Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg. Fired up by the idea of a Jewish socialist homeland in the Soviet Union, ICOR's Canadian branches became a separate organization in 1935 under the name the Canadian Birobidzhan Committee.

This pro-Soviet Jewish group and its sister organization, the American Committee for the Settlement of Jews in Birobidjan (Ambijan), which catered to native-born, middle-class Jews, have been virtually ignored by historians.

Henry Felix Srebrnik, a professor of political studies at the University of Prince Edward Island and the author of London Jews and British Communism, 1935-1945, has deftly filled that gap with Jerusalem on the Amur: Birobidzhan and the Canadian Jewish Communist Movement, 1924-1951 (McGill-Queen's University Press).

Srebrnik's book, an impressive work of scholarship based on oral interviews, newspapers, pamphlets, belles lettres, poems, and organizational notices and advertisements, is part and parcel of the McGill-Queen's series in ethnic history, edited by John Zucchi.

Meticulously researched and lucidly written, Jerusalem on the Amur is balanced and objective insofar as its narrative is concerned. Yet Srebrnik is hardly a detached observer.

As he puts it in the preface: "This book, I hope, will serve as a cautionary tale, for it illustrates how otherwise intelligent, critical people can be misled by an unscrupulous, indeed murderous, regime and place their hopes for a better world in the hands of people who turn out to be political criminals, even sociopaths. It is the story of people who accepted as truth the lies and fantasies spun by cynical propagandists and who put their trust in those who were building not socialism but gulags."

Birobidzhan and the Canadian Jewish Communist Movement, 1924–1951

Srebrnik defines Jewish communists as Jews who wished to combine their ethnic identity with their internationalist, class-based politics. Blending elements of Marxist universalism with Jewish territorial nationalism, they were active mainly between 1917, the year of the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia, and 1956, the year in which Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev, in a speech to the Communist party, exposed Joseph Stalin's crimes against Soviet Jews.

Hardly confined to North America, the Jewish communist galaxy also sparkled in Europe, South Africa, Latin America and Australia.

As Srebrnik notes, the rise of the Soviet Union was hailed as the harbinger of a new age, heralding the end of czarist marginalization and persecution.

The Soviet Union, Jewish communists theorized, would fight anti-Semitism and foster Yidddish culture. No more pogroms or economic, political and residential restrictions on Jewish life.

"The Jewish settlement in Birobidzhan would arouse widespread interest among those who sought in Jewish territorialism and colonization a solution to statelessness, including many who were otherwise not enamoured of the Soviet state or communist ideology," he writes in summarizing its appeal.

Having recognized Jews as a legitimate nationality, the Soviet Union had no qualms about backing the Birobidzhan project, he adds. "Jewish projects would thus be portrayed and ideologically justified as being in the interests of the building of socialism and Soviet power and as part of the larger solution to the national question and the resultant fraternity of the Soviet peoples."

When Jewish settlement in Birobidzhan began, the region was already inhabited by 28,000 Russians, Ukrainians and Koreans and 1,300 Jews. In 1929, a commission of experts, headed by an American, concluded that agriculture could flourish in Birobidjhan and that valuable minerals could be extracted from its soil. The commissioners cautioned that the new territory would require overseas assistance to survive.

ICOR, which opposed Zionism, portrayed itself as a non-partisan organization in which Jews from all political orientations and social ranks could find a comfortable place.

Mindful of Birobidzhan's needs, ICOR initially presented it with two electric stations, an incubator capable of producing 32,000 eggs, machinery to fell timber, trench-digging equipment, a printing press and cars and trucks.

In addition, thousands of Jews from the Diaspora settled in Birobidzhan.

Having achieved independence from the U.S. branch, the Canadian operation, directed by Abraham Shek, held its first national convention in Toronto in March 1935. Fifty-one delegates from nine cities attended. Among the members of ICOR's national executive was J.B. Salsberg, a communist who later left the party and wrote a weekly column for The Canadian Jewish News. ICOR applied for membership in Canadian Jewish Congress, but was not admitted.

Birobidzhan, trotted out by Moscow as proof that anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union had been eliminated, was not the haven it was trumped up to be. Stalin purged its Jewish leadership, and immigration to Birobidzhan dried up. In the aftermath of World War II, state anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union and its eastern Europe satellites surged.

"Perhaps the coup de grâce for Birobidzhan was the creation of the State of Israel," Srebrnik observes, adding that Moscow's resolutely pro-Arab line in the Middle East also alienated Jews.

"Yet another factor in the decline of Jewish communism in Canada was the large influx of Holocaust survivors into the country," he writes, explaining that the majority were traditional Jews who had no illusions about communism and the Soviet Union.

"The demise of ICOR and the Canadian Birobidzhan Committee was a part of the passing of an entire era in Jewish life," Srebrnik surmises. "As the State of Israel became the central and most important feature of postwar Jewish life, Birobidjhan receded into the mists of history."

By the last count, only some 4,000 Jews, comprising five per cent of its population, lived in Birobidzhan.

To Srebrnik, Birobidzhan was nothing more than a "sandcastle" or a Potemkin construct.

Harsh words, these. But Srebrnik is correct.

NEWISH PLAY BY JONATHAN GARFINKEL, COMBINES SEX AND MIDEAST POLITICS

House of Many Tongues, an almost-new play by Toronto poet-playwright Jonathan Garfinkel, opens next week in Toronto.

The plot focuses on a former Israeli general (played by Howard Jerome) and his 15-year-old son (Daniel Karasik) who wants no part in his father's life as he tries to bring peace to the Middle East through improved sexual techniques. "When a Palestinian named Abu Dalo (Hrant Alianak) shows up, after a nearly 40-year absence, and lays claim to the general's house, things start to heat up." They heat up even more when the general's son becomes involved with the Palestinian's daughter.

Garfinkel is the author of two earlier plays, a book of poetry and a non-fiction book, Ambivalence, about his experiences in Israel and the West Bank. House of Many Tongues has already been staged in Germany and plans call for it to be translated into Hebrew. Directed by Richard Rose, it previews in the Mainspace at Tarragon Theatre on Wednesday, April 29 and opens May 6. Tickets $32 - $10. 416-531-1827, tickets. tarragontheatre.com

Names in the News: Michelle Obama was given a copy of the award-winning Canadian children's book Hana's Suitcase on a visit to Prague last week with her husband, U.S. President Barack Obama. The bestselling book was written by CBC publisher Karen Levine and was published by Toronto's Second Story Press. It tells the story of Hana Brady, a young Czech girl killed in Auschwitz. Michelle Obama was taking a tour of Prague's old Jewish ghetto and Jewish Museum when she was given the book and several others.

Inspired by a news story that appeared originally in The CJN, Levine wrote Hana's Suitcase about 2002; a subsequent stage adaptation has toured Canada, United States, Israel and Japan. As well, two film versions have been made, including the new documentary Inside Hana's Suitcase. The documentary received a glowing review after a recent screening in Vancouver and is slated for two showings, April 30 and May 3, in the upcoming Hot Docs Festival in Toronto. Toronto lawyer says writing is his first love

Rotenberg says he was very gratified when an old friend, the child of survivors, told him: "Your book brought me back to a place of my childhood."

Gryfe's bagels have a prominent place in the narrative, because Rotenberg, who grew up in the Lawrence Avenue and Bathurst Street area, was a bakery regular.

In fact, one scene is taken from a true boyhood experience, he says. "We used to go up to Gryfe's with winter gloves. They would give us the bagels the moment they came out of the oven."

Rotenberg's literary success has been almost 20 years in the making. He says he started writing his first novel in 1991. "It's still sitting in a drawer. There was no interest in the book."

But this failure had a silver lining. As Rotenberg puts it. "My first book taught me how to write the second book."

In Old City Hall, he has drawn on his legal experience to expose the seedier side of the justice system. It's evident that he's navigating familiar territory when he describes the Don Jail or the lock-up in the courthouse.

And while Rotenberg finds law rewarding, he says writing is first love.

He spent 10 years after law school as a magazine editor. He was the managing editor of Passion, an English magazine published in Paris. Later, he was the owner/editor of T.O. the Magazine of Toronto.

The father of three opened his law office 18 years ago out of financial necessity. "I had kids and a mortgage."

He completed his second novel in 2001, but finding a New York agent was tough, he recalls. "I was rejected by many agents."

In 2007, a friend encouraged him to contact Victoria Skurnick, a top literary agent. "I called her expecting nothing. I told her, 'I'm very serious about writing. I sent my first story to New York when I was 15.'"

The two soon discovered they shared the same taste in literature, and by the end of that first conversation, Skurnick asked him to e-mail her the book.

He says she called him back two days later. "She said, 'I'm going to get everyone in New York to read your book and I'm going to sell the book around the world. I know what sells.'"

That summer, Skurnick sent the book to 20 American editors and a bidding war ensued. Farrar Straus & Giroux, the publisher of such prestigious writers as Tom Wolfe and Scott Turow, bought the North American rights, Rotenberg says. "They sign very few writers."

Of course, there's the obvious question to put to Rotenberg: now that he's hit the literary jackpot, will he be throwing in the legal towel?

"I always want to practise law. I'm committed to it," he says. "But I won't be doing a big six-month murder trial anytime soon."

Israeli tennis stars triumph on and off court

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — Israeli tennis stars Shahar Peer and Andy Ram were cheered by Florida tennis fans watching them compete recently at the Sony Ericsson Open – and not just for their excellence on the court.

Both Israelis won support from fans, media, major Jewish organizations and tennis players after Peer was a victim of discrimination. In February, Peer was denied entry into the United Arab Emirates and banned from the Dubai women's tennis tournament because she holds an Israeli passport.

Women's Tennis Association (WTA) president Larry Scott fined the Dubai tournament $300,000 (all figures US), awarded Peer $44,250 as a result of the actions of the UAE, and she and other Israelis will be now accepted into future Dubai tournaments. Ram benefitted from the WTA ruling and international condemnation of the incident by being accepted into the men's tournament on Feb. 20 as the first Israeli ever to compete in Dubai. Had Ram not been accepted into the tournament, the men's Dubai tournament likely would have been boycotted by the men's pro tennis circuit.

"I was very disappointed and angry too because I don't think sports and politics should mix," Peer said following her 6-1, 7-6 victory at the Sony Ericsson Open over Tamaryn Hendler, a Jewish player from Belgium.

"I was happy with what was achieved and having so much support from around the world. It does not matter if a person is Jewish, Israeli, Muslim, black or white. Nobody will be discriminated against in sport in the future."

"Shahar was stoic in taking the high road challenging an unjust policy and forcing the UAE to accept Israelis in the future," Scott said. "The tennis tour will not tolerate discrimination of any kind in the future."

Had the UAE not permitted Ram to play, tennis tournaments around the world, including the Rogers Cup, held annually in Toronto, may have been put at risk. Emirates Airlines – the official sponsor of the Rogers Cup Toronto tournament, as well as other tournaments worldwide – would have been dropped as part of the sanctions against the UAE, which owns the carrier.

"They [the UAE] knew that they were morally wrong in denying Peer a visa, and we told them what would happen had they not reversed their actions immediately. Tennis Canada would not be allowed to have Emirates as one of their sponsors," said Stacey Allaster, a past Rogers Cup Toronto tournament director who is now president of the WTA.

Shahar Peer meets former Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Despite Peer's view of "sports not mixing with politics," Swedish tennis officials in Malmo barred spectators from watching the Davis Cup tie between Sweden and Israel, held March 6 to 8, fearing security would not be able to handle anti-Israel protesters.

"It was disgusting to see the anti-Israel sentiment as our team went to the arena in Malmo. I have never personally seen hate until we were in Malmo," said Ram, one of four members of the Israeli team.

Trailing 2-1, Israeli Davis Cup players Dudi Sela and Harel Levy rallied with two five-set victories to emerge victorious, winning the tie 3-2 and leading Israel to host the Davis Cup quarter-finals, versus Russia, for the first time since 1988.

"It was a wonderful moment of feeling such pride in what we accomplished. Not having spectators really hurt the Swedish team who could not rally behind their fans. But all of us would have preferred for the matches to have fans and not played behind closed doors," Ram said.

On April 2, the International Tennis Federation fined the Swedish Tennis Federation $25,000 and the city of Malmo was barred from hosting any Davis Cup matches for five years.

"Peer, Ram and the other Israeli tennis players are outstanding athletes and leaders. They will always be praised and remembered for their courage against unjust acts," said Andrew Rosenkrantz, Florida director of the Anti-Defamation League. He was speaking at a reception at Miami's Beth David Congregation for Shahar or Israeli and Jewish tennis players competing at the Sony Ericsson Open.

Peer and Ram have played well since the Dubai and Malmo incidents. Peer finished as doubles finalist in the Indian Wells tournament in March, as did Ram at the same event.

Ram continued his outstanding run by winning the Sony Ericsson Open men's doubles championship, marking the first time an Israeli has won the doubles title in the 25-year history of the tournament.

Teamed with Max Mirnyi of Belarus, Ram triumphed over five opponents, including a dramatic come-from-behind 6-7 (4-7), 6-2, (10-7) victory over Australians Ashley Fisher and Stephen Huss in the final on April 5. A jubilant Ram waved the Israeli flag and thanked his many fans at the podium following his victory, with many fans also waving Israeli flags during his matches.

"It's nice to know I made history again for Israel, making headlines there. I'm very patriotic. I feel really proud when I get a big result like today. Playing with Max made it easier to win the tournament. I hope from now on we [Israelis] make headlines for what we do on the court, not off," said Ram.

Barring injuries, Peer and Ram are expected to compete at the Rogers Cup women's and men's tournaments this summer in Toronto and Montreal respectively. For further information, visit www.rogerscup.com.

The creative cycle

ALMOST FAMOUS

By Jacob Medjuck

Beverly Hills. 11 a.m. I'm waiting in the office of Jim Carrey's manager, staring at a giant wall-photo of lava pouring into the ocean. It's explosive. Violent. Steam, smoke and sparks. The image is larger than my rented car.

In walks Eric Gold, industry genie.

"What do you think of this picture?" He asks me.

I realize that there's only one correct answer: "What do you think of it Mr. Gold?"

He smiles. "You'll do fine." Sitting, he shares: "Most people see this volcano and think destruction. I've been asked to take it down."

While we're talking, someone actually comes in and asks when he'll take it down.

"I see creation," he continues. "It's fierce, and messy, but constructive, and natural."

During our meeting, Gold takes a 45-minute call from Mike Myers in front of me to tweak the plot of a project. I find myself casually volunteering suggestions, most of which get discarded glances. And then I realize, after all this time, I'm still a failure. But, I'm failing at the highest level. Fantastic!

I look at the wall volcano. Destruction. This town is taking my ideas and burning me alive. I'm also trying to get a release for my completed film while the distribution landscape collapses around me. Even studios are perplexed by new technologies and what models they'll yield. The sky is falling, ground crumbling beneath me. Every established pipeline for distribution is in chaos. I wonder what will become of my celebrated opus, Summerhood? Or new projects even?

Evolution has the worst timing. But it's a certainty. Every so often, a technology comes along that uproots the patterns of standard business. Shattering paradigms and crashing titans.

I recall the celebrated times of Charlie Chaplin and Buster Keaton. A golden era of film. An era of "silent" film. The biggest stars working lost their jobs when "talkies" came about and it unfolded that many great "faces" had disappointingly shrill voices.

Families used to huddle around the radio until television ended that. Tape cassettes drove records into the ground, and then CDs buried both. The VHS business was decimated by DVDs, now being replaced by Blu-ray. Of course, the Internet destroyed everything. Everything.

But then I remember: theatre predates electricity. And before that, we had the Coliseum. Storytelling will always exist. Only the venues change. Grasping that, I feel secure to daydream again. To imagine. To write – knowing it will find a way to you.

Volcanic rock is coarse and unstable, but it's the most fertile. I look at the photo again. This time I see creation. If I can weather the disaster, I'll be the first to plant in rich soils.

Now is the time of the ant. Be steadfast and have patience. The winner will be the last person standing, not necessarily the most qualified; on those terms, I submit myself.

My film has won awards across North America, been invited to PIXAR, and this summer will play in Italy at the most prestigious children's festival on the planet. Summerhood has earned a proper release. Meanwhile, the mechanics of new distribution models are still cooling. I derive patience from having seen the film enjoyed by thousands. It's youthful without pander; it's pioneering. It's honest, hopeful, heartfelt and filthy, but has a great message.

I just wanted to teach little boys to be a little better to little girls. This includes little boys I know in their 60s. (Narration by John Cusack helps plenty.)

As the venues of storytelling transition, I end my final CJN column so:

Thank you for reading.

I thank The CJN for publishing.

You'll all be character witnesses at my trial.

You can find me on the film's website.

Cue the cartoon pig: "Th- Th- Th-That's all folks."

Exercise can help arthritis sufferers

FITNESS CORNER

By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Living with arthritis is hard and sometimes very frustrating, but it can be managed.

There are many different types of arthritis, but anyone who has it knows it doesn't matter what kind you have, the end result is the same: pain. Many recent studies have been done on the effects of exercise on arthritic pain, and they all say the same thing. Exercise – modified to your level and condition – in most cases (80 to 90 per cent) relieves arthritic pain and is essential to sustaining functional joint movement.

Aerobic and strength training was once thought to promote the deterioration of the joints, but we now know that low-impact strength and aerobic exercise is not only very safe, it's actually beneficial for arthritis sufferers. Daily exercise has been found to stabilize joints, improve joint function and flexibility, decrease pain, and improve cardiovascular health and balance.

Aquatics, as well as light, controlled weight training such as machine-based exercises (for instance, leg curls, lat pull-downs and the chest press), are recommended exercises that prevent de-conditioning of muscle tissue, which is important for joint support and function.

The use of a treadmill – or, even better, an elliptical trainer or stationary bike – will improve blood circulation and cardiovascular health while having little or no impact on your joints. Exercises such as yoga or stretch classes have been found to increase tendon and ligament flexibility. This increases range of motion in joints, which is important for continued mobility.

Exercises should be monitored by a professional and consist of three different factors: stretching, muscle conditioning and low-impact aerobic activity for cardiovascular and circulatory health. Exercise done safely within an individual's pain comfort zone can reduce joint pain and improve endurance for physical activity, which in turn helps support independent living.

We all know that exercise promotes health and wellness, but now more and more studies are finding that daily exercise not only promotes healthy weight management, it also controls pain, improves your quality of life and inhibits disease.

What's stopping you?

Happy Birthday, Israel

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

On May 14, 1948, the first prime minister of Israel, David Ben-Gurion, publicly read the Declaration of Independence. It was the fifth day of Iyar, the eighth month of the year, in 5708. The anniversary of this date on the Hebrew calendar is known as Yom Ha'atzmaut. This year, we celebrate it on Wednesday, April 29.

This is a wondrous holiday for many. Did you know that the Chief Rabbinate of Israel has declared Yom Ha'atzmaut one of the Jewish holidays in which Hallel should be recited? Hallel is an added prayer that is sung on joyous occasions such as Passover, Shavuot, Sukkot, Chanukah and Rosh Chodesh.

Religious Zionists have created a group of prayers for the holiday, which includes psalms and a Haftorah portion from the Prophets on the holiday morning. There are groups that add the prayer Al Hanisim (for the miracles; it is commonly read on Chanukah and Purim), as the establishment of the State of Israel is seen as a miraculous moment. Some Jews blow the shofar on Yom Ha'atzmaut.

The Conservative Movement reads a Torah portion for the day and includes a version of Al Hanisim. Some places read the Haftorah, Isaiah 10:32-12:6, which is also read on the last day of Pesach. The Reform Movement includes the special prayer, Ya'leh V'yavo, an addition to the Amidah (the 18 blessings we recite standing) that is also included on Rosh Chodesh, the pilgrimage festivals, Rosh Hashanah, and Yom Kippur.

Well, we are the Jewish people; therefore a room of five will ensure opinions from six.

Most Chassidim and haredim do not make any changes to their daily prayers. There are those who see Yom Ha'aztmaut as a sad day and wave black flags and wear sackcloth as a sign of mourning. Members of such chassidic groups as Satmar fast to atone for what they view as the sin of having created the State of Israel. They see this as a transgression, because to them, Israel was created as a secular state. They believe that God promised that the Jewish people would return to Israel by means of the actions of the Messiah, who would be sent if the Jewish people merited his arrival.

Some Arab citizens of Israel celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut. Others see it as a tragic day and refer to it as as the nakba (the catastrophe).

Mostly, Yom Ha'atzmaut is an exciting day in Israel and the Diaspora. Thousands of Israelis have picnics and barbecues (known in Israeli slang as "mangal" – from the Arabic word meaning "stove"). On the night before Yom Ha'atzmaut, people sing and dance in the streets and balconies are decorated with Israeli flags.

We are blessed to live in this time when the State of Israel was established and has grown in 61 short years to be a modern, progressive and spiritual environment. The State of Israel and its citizens are responsible for the creation of dozens of technological and medical advancements. There are more learning environments in Israel than ever before, and it is home to millions of refugees – both Jewish and non-Jewish – who otherwise would have been homeless.

There is no need to write about the complexities and controversies surrounding Israel. We all know about those. What is important on Israel's birthday is simply that we light a candle, wish for peace and health, and then throw off all our troubles and dance in the street in celebration. Happy Yom Ha'atzmaut. Am Yisrael Chai. The nation of Israel shall live. Next year we should celebrate with Gilad Schalit.

Israel supporters leave mark on Durban II

By ADENA PHILIPS
Special to The CJN

GENEVA — While last week's UN-led World Conference Against Racism made headlines with walkouts by delegates during Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's anti-Israel inaugural speech and for its general anti-Zionist timbre, a separate conference across Lake Geneva proclaimed Israel's right to statehood.

The concurrent Conference Against Racism, Discrimination and Persecution – hosted by UN Watch and sponsored by a host of NGOs, including the Darfur Peace and Development Organization, the International Day Against Homophobia, the American Jewish Committee and the World Students Christian Federation – attracted more than 700 registrants, Canadian UN Watch intern Alexis Levy told The CJN.

Representing Canada at the protest gathering in Geneva were Pierre Poilievre, parliamentary secretary to Prime Minister Stephen Harper, and Liberal MP and noted human rights advocate Irwin Cotler.

Other notable speakers at the event included French philosopher Bernard-Henri Lévy, former Soviet refusenik and Israeli MK Natan Sharansky and Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz.

Poilievre said it was an honour to represent his government at the counter-conference and a privilege to be able to speak alongside Sharansky, Cotler and Dershowitz, whom he termed three of his "heroes."

'We shall not die, but live'

These words of the Hallel prayer, as always, were the animating force of the annual March of the Living. Some 9,000 people from around the world joined the three-kilometre march from Auschwitz to Birkenau. Participants this year also drew attention to the exploitation by Holocaust deniers of the UN anti-racism review conference in Geneva (known as Durban II), which began on Holocaust Remembrance Day. Israeli Vice-Prime Minister Silvan Shalom, centre, wearing a blue jacket, led the march. Former chief Ashkenazi rabbi of Israel, Yisrael Meir Lau, is immediately to Shalom's left. Canadian MP Irwin Cotler, third from the left, was also in the vanguard of the march. [Photo Moshe Milner/GPO/Flash90]

The News in Brief

CANADA

PM Invites Bibi

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Stephen Harper has invited new Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to visit Canada. A statement issued April 16 by Harper's office said a "congratulatory" phone call from Harper to Netanyahu also included talks "focused on the impact of the economic crisis, regional dynamics in the Middle East and the peace process." It added that both men "agreed to meet at the earliest opportunity." No date had been set as of last week.

Natives Give Gift

WINNIPEG — The Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs (AMC) gave $1 million to the Canadian Museum of Human Rights last week, leaving it just $1 million shy of its fundraising goal as construction on it began in the Manitoba capital. The donation came from profits from the South Beach Casino Resort, the Winnipeg Sun reported. Three levels of governments have pledged $160 million toward the $265-million cost. This latest gift brings total private donations to $104 million, said fundraising chair Gail Asper, whose late father, Izzy Asper, founder of Canwest Global Communications, conceived of the museum.

Borovoy Honoured

TORONTO — Alan Borovoy, longtime general counsel of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association (CCLA), was honoured April 28 at a gala dinner in Toronto to mark his retirement. The CCLA was formed in 1964 and Borovoy, 77, has headed it since 1968. He's being succeeded by law professor Nathalie Des Rosiers.

Paisley Park Named

TORONTO — A portion of Windfields Park at York Mills Road and Bayview Avenue was formally renamed April 23 in honour of Irving Paisley, a longtime politician in the old city of North York. For more than 30 years, Paisley served on the council of the old township, borough and cities of North York as a councillor, controller and finally as deputy mayor. He was also founding chair of York Finch General Hospital and a founding member of Temple Sinai and the Reena Foundation.

WORLD

Exports To Be Probed

LONDON — The United Kingdom will review all arms exports to Israel, its foreign secretary said. During Israel's recent incursion into Gaza, British lawmakers demanded the government ensure its weapons parts weren't used against Palestinians. At the time, Foreign Secretary David Miliband promised to look into the issue, and on April 21, he issued a statement detailing all direct and indirect arms exports to Israel. He promised that all current and future Israeli arms exports would be reviewed "in light of recent events in Gaza." He said Britain's military exports to Israel are less than one per cent of Israel's military imports.

Campuses May Close

LOS ANGELES — The Reform movement's rabbinical school might close two of its three U.S. campuses. The board of Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion will meet next month to find ways of dealing with HUC's financial problems, including whether to keep open just one of three branches in Cincinnati, Los Angeles and New York, the Los Angeles Times reported. Other options include merging programs while keeping more than one campus open. HUC faces a $3-million (US) deficit due to declines in congregational dues and its endowment.

Israel Event Nixed

LONDON — A London theatre cancelled a Yom Ha'atzmaut event after pressure from pro-Palestinian groups who objected to Israel's Gaza incursion. The Bloomsbury Theatre told the Zionist Federation of Britain of its decision April 21. The event, slated for this week, was to take place at another venue that wasn't immediately disclosed. The annual event was to feature an Israel Defence Forces choir at the main memorial to Israeli soldiers. Some of those objecting say they'd protest at the new venue. The controversy boosted ticket sales.

Canada, Israel Finalizing Diplomatic Deal

CARACAS — Canada and Israel are close to completing an agreement on how Canada will represent Israel's diplomatic and consular interests in Venezuela, according to the Canadian embassy in Caracas.

Venezuela severed diplomatic ties with Israel in January in the wake of Israel's military incursion into Gaza.

"The Canadian Embassy has encouraged and continues to encourage the Venezuelan government to follow through on its commitment to reject and combat anti-Semitism and to do its utmost to ensure the security of the Jewish community and its religious and cultural centres," Virginie Levesque, an official at the Canadian Embassy in Caracas, told JTA last week.

Canada will convey messages between the Venezuelan and Israeli governments. The two governments are also close to finalizing which services the Canadian Embassy will provide Israeli citizens in Venezuela, Levesque said.

Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez was among the most strident critics of Israel during its Gaza incursion, which precipitated an outpouring of anti-Semitism unusual for this Latin American country. Following Chavez's calling Israel a "genocidal state," media outlets closely aligned with his government not only criticized Israel but demanded that the local Jewish community do the same. The city's main shul was attacked, though local authorities have since said it was a robbery made to look like a hate crime.

Levesque said she didn't know why Israel approached Canada to represent its interests in Venezuela. Officials at Israel's embassy in Ottawa were unavailable for comment.

Recession hits people across the spectrum: JF&C

Richard Cummings

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

People you would least expect are being affected by the current economic downturn, says Richard Cummings, executive director of Jewish Family and Child.

"Demand for our services is increasing, and it is among people across [the spectrum]," he said.

Monica Auerbach, JF&C's director of York Region services, said that a number of families in Thornhill Woods took out large mortgages and subsequently lost their jobs or have had their hours decreased.

"They're having trouble keeping up their payments, they're stressed, and the whole family is being affected. Kids are sensing their parents anxiety, and they're having issues at school," she said.

"Some families lose their homes, are forced to move in with the grandparents and they in turn become anxious. This recession is affecting the whole community."

Wendy Wolfman, the agency's director of family and community services, added that the full impact of the recession has yet to be seen.

"Those who lost their jobs are still getting employment insurance. Our concern is that demand will spike when these [benefits] end. More and more people will come in for financial support. That is when we will see people [who were in a higher economic bracket] coming to our door."

Clients are coming in at all stages, she said. "They could be looking for support from our financial assistance program – they must be on Ontario Works before they are eligible – for help with their kids, or for help dealing with the tension at home. When stress builds, there is an increase in domestic violence. We also see an increase in alcohol abuse and gambling. Some use gambling as a dream."

One client was evicted from his apartment because he was unable to pay the rent, she said, and not only did he have to deal with downsizing, he needed to find an available and affordable apartment that was close to the Jewish community.

In another case, a woman came into the York Region office with her three children, Auerbach said, "and told us that she was still on maternity leave and her husband had lost his job. Winter was approaching and the kids needed boots, coats and pajamas. I was able to refer her to intake for financial assistance. She was embarrassed to ask for help, but she had no other support."

She said that more and more middle class families are making use of the clothing depot at JF&C's family resource centre inside the Promenade Shopping Centre. "For $10 a season, families can take part in a clothing exchange. They donate what their kids have outgrown, and they choose whatever other clothing is available. I don't think this service would have been necessary two or three years ago."

The agency has seen an increase of referrals to its women abuse program, Cummings said, because some men become abusive when they are under stress. "Money is the root of many problems, and poverty [brings about] a vulnerability in women and children."

Understanding Israel

From the editor's desk...

In the years before the Yom Kippur War, when Israel was known for reasons other than its conflict with the Palestinians, there were many symbols and images that expressed the unique sparkle, exuberance and determination of this amazing, plucky, little country to the outside world: the kibbutznik wearing khaki shorts and a khaki cap; the dramatic, awesome force of Masada; the Jaffa orange; the sabra and many, many more.

Each of these icons, for its own many-layered reasons, conveyed a simplified, even romanticized aspect of Israel's complicated reality that fit with the experiences of the welcomed tourist and a proud Diaspora family dispersed to the four corners of the world.

Today, by contrast, after 3-1/2 decades of relentless vilification and demonization of the Jewish state by its enemies, the predominant, if not in some places, the only icon that accompanies the name "Israel" is its conflict with the Palestinian Arabs.

Of course, it is a false icon, both in the manner that it is depicted and as the determinative image of the state.

Cleverly cultivated, it has become the commanding image of the Jewish state, a devil's maypole around which so many people, trance-like, dance and chant and perform their various works in service of a hateful idolatry: the removal of Israel from the world map.

But to really understand the essence of the people of Israel, to really plumb the depths of the spiritual attachment of the people to this ancient-modern place, to really grasp the connection between the place as a sovereign home for the Jewish people and that home as a refuge for all Jews of the world, one should reflect upon an image of Israel little seen by the outside: the country on Yom Hazikaron (Remembrance Day for the fallen soldiers).

Yom Hazikaron is commemorated the day preceding Yom Ha'atzmaut. (This in itself is a profound testimony to the moral underpinning of the country.) This year, Yom Hazikaron began at sundown on Monday night, three nights ago, this week. A one-minute, mournful siren sounded across the country at 8 p.m. to signal the start of national remembrance.

Accompanied by the chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, and representatives of parents who have lost soldier children, President Shimon Peres inaugurated the official remembrance ceremony at the Western Wall in Jerusalem.

The next morning, Tuesday, the entire country came to a halt at 11 a.m., with the sounding of a two-minute siren. For those who have not been part of the remembrance, or witnessed it, it is a powerful sight to behold. Cars come to a stop on highways and city streets. People alight from their cars to stand respectfully in silence attention.

The central national service takes place at the Mount Herzl Military Cemetery in Jerusalem. But public ceremonies and private observances are conducted throughout the country at 43 other cemeteries.

No one usually intrudes into the private space around the visitors to the cemeteries. No one makes small talk. No one seeks comfort. Everyone seeks simply that quiet moment of seeing, once again and for the smallest fraction of time, into the past.

Visitors hold hands or place a hand upon a stooped shoulder. They brush away the dust of the surrounding soil and garden from the headstone, place a flower, or, as the woman seen in the accompanying photo, touch the stone that marks the final place of a loved one.

Everyone understands that there are certain wounds that time cannot fully heal. For everyone is in one way or another, literally or figuratively, wounded.

To honour the volunteers from overseas who fought and died during the War of Independence, a special ceremony is held at the Machal (an acronym standing for volunteers from overseas) memorial near the Sha'ar Hagai Junction on the western approaches to Jerusalem.

In the past 12 months, 133 soldiers and security personnel were killed in the line of duty. These numbers are added to the new total of 22,570 servicemen and women who have fallen in defence of the land of Israel since 1860, the year that Jews moved out beyond the walls of the Old City of Jerusalem to live in other parts of the country.

Israel's national day of remembrance is a day of melancholy and tenderness. There are no rabid demonstrations of anger, no inciteful remonstrations of hatred against the enemy. People set aside profound or petty political differences to recall, grieve and mourn together. To see and feel this day is to forever cherish and embrace an image of Israel that is truer to its essence: of private, quiet weeping and unbending national resolve.

New documentary makes the case for Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Harvard University law professor, author and pro-Israel advocate Alan Dershowitz is at the centre of a new documentary, The Case for Israel: Democracy's Outpost, which defends Israel as a democratic state coping with threats in a hostile environment.

The film, which has been making the rounds of synagogues and Jewish organizations in the United States, was screened in Toronto recently at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Although Dershowitz receives top billing in it in terms of air time, the film also features the comments of, among others, Benjamin Netanyahu, Israel's new prime minister; Dan Gillerman, Israel's former ambassador to the United Nations; Michael Oren, an Israeli historian, and Dennis Ross, adviser to U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton on Persian Gulf affairs and former U.S. special envoy to the Middle East.

The 77-minute film, which was made before last winter's Israeli election and Israel's invasion of the Gaza Strip, is a slick exercise in public relations on behalf of an embattled state that has been singled out for demonization.

Dershowitz, a persuasive speaker, makes the case for Israel's legitimacy and right to self-defence.

Describing himself as both pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian, he supports a two-state solution to resolve Israel's long-standing conflict with the Palestinians.

He argues that they could have had a state by now had their leadership accepted Israel's proposals at the Camp David summit in July 2000. Dershowitz adds that a two-state solution will only be possible when the Palestinians desire self-determination more than Israel's destruction.

His comment should be treated with a note of caution. Hamas has not reconciled itself to Israel's existence, but the Palestinian Authority, headed by President Mahmoud Abbas, seeks to resume talks with Israel on the basis of a two-state solution.

Gerald Steinberg, an Israeli academic whose opinions overlap with the Likud party, says that most Israelis accept a two-state solution. But Netanyahu is an exception to the rule, having refused to commit himself to the concept, which the Obama administration is currently promoting.

Dershowitz condemns former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, saying that he "misrepresents facts." Carter's recent book, Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid, touched off a storm of criticism.

Alan Dershowitz

Ross agrees with Dershowitz's assessment, noting that Carter has embraced a revisionist view of Middle East events. In this respect, Oren castigates Carter for unfairly linking Israel with the apartheid smear.

More harshly, Dershowitz charges that Carter has "blood on his hands." How so? Dershowitz claims that, since Carter supposedly advised the former Palestinian leader, Yasser Arafat, to reject Israel's Camp David offer, Carter is at least partially responsible for the outbreak of the second intifadah, which has claimed many Jewish and Arab lives since September 2000.

In a further comment, Dershowitz blames the Arabs for having caused the Palestinian refugee problem, though he admits that Israel expelled Palestinian civilians during the 1948 war, a point that Israeli historian Benny Morris amplifies.

Defending Israel's policy of erecting checkpoints in the West Bank to control the movement of Palestinians, Dershowitz says that they will disappear when Palestinian terrorism ceases.

Dershowitz observes that major issues in Israel are sometimes referred to the Supreme Court, citing the building of the controversial security fence.

The former chief justice, Aharon Barak, believes the barrier is legally valid if it protects Israelis from suicide bombers. But if the barrier is used for political purposes, such as the acquisition of land in the West Bank, its legality is questionable, he suggests.

The film glosses over the fact that the route of the barrier cuts into the West Bank and does not usually follow the international border. It also ignores an Israeli government admission that the route of the fence will determine Israel's boundary with the West Bank.

Strangely enough, too, the film omits the reason why Israel wants to move the border further into the West Bank – the Jewish settlements. This is a key issue and cannot be swept under the rug.

Dershowitz is on firmer ground when he states that Israel is unfairly singled out for condemnation, while countries that routinely violate human rights, such as Saudi Arabia, are given a free ride.

Concurring with this argument, Irwin Cotler, a Canadian parliamentarian, former justice minister and law professor, excoriates the United Nations' Human Rights Council for its single-minded focus on Israel.

Cotler's colleague, Anne Bayefsky, says that the United Nations' "apparatus" is structurally anti-Israel.

Dershowitz expresses puzzlement why people who support democracy, feminism and gay rights, which are protected in Israel but not in the Muslim world, are anti-Israel.

Calling Israel "an island of sanity" and "an outpost of democracy" in an Arab totalitarian sea, Gillerman says that today's wave of "anti-Israelism" is the "new anti-Semitism."

By inference, he compares Iran's quest for a nuclear arsenal and its denunciation of Israel's right to exist with the policies of Nazi Germany.

Netanyahu observes that Israel's legitimacy in the region is confirmed by the weight of history.

And indeed it is. Jerusalem is mentioned in the Hebrew Bible 667 times, but not even once in the Qur'an.

Facts like this are important, particularly in a week when, in the Jewish calendar, Israel is marking its 61st anniversary of statehood.

Israel is 61!

It is an irony of their ignorance, a myopia of their malice, that many, if not most of the "let's-boycott-apartheid-Israel" crowd probably use cellphones to speak to each other. On occasion, they undoubtedly leave voice mail messages for each other as well. But if their earnest honesty were not subordinated to their hyper-zealous hypocrisy, they would use neither the cellphone nor voice mail. They would boycott the technologies, since both high-tech devices were developed in Israel.

Indeed, prospective boycotters of Israel would have to surrender many modern devices and live a more retrograde life, shall we say, that more closely matches the nature of their worldview. For countless Israeli high-tech, medical, electronic and engineering inventions are used around the world to the betterment and advancement of the quality and standard of life.

Israel's population is about 7.4 million people, comprising approximately 1/1000th of the world's population. In terms of the number of its people, it is one of the smallest countries in the world. But in terms of the nature and sheer scale of its contributions to science, medicine, technology, scholarship and culture, it is one of the largest countries in the world.

This inverse achievement ratio of the Jewish state is one of the most exciting and compelling stories of the modern era. It gives pride to all of the tiny country's supporters.

Yet, it inflames and baffles Israel's enemies. They cannot fathom – other than through portraits of self-pity, constant iterations of victimhood or fierce exhortations of hatred and loathing – that the Jewish people, too, are at home in the Land of Israel. They cannot grasp that there is a palpable sense of history and collective Jewish purpose that fuse and come alive in Israel. Alas, they cannot abide that the Jewish return will be for the benefit of all nations in the region.

Yesterday, the fifth day of Iyar in the Hebrew calendar, we celebrated that story. We sang hope-filled, grateful choruses of Hallelujah. It was the 61st anniversary of the founding of the young state, truly an epochal moment for the Jewish people, and indeed for the entire world.

The sliver of land along the eastern shore of the Mediterranean has not known a single day of peace since its birth. Yet it has prevailed through war and terror and boycott in pursuing its millennial mission of repairing its imperfections, mending its societal deficiencies and joining with all humanity in trying to make our world the very best it can be. The cellphone, voice mail, instant messaging, the cherry tomato, drip irrigation, the Pentium computer chip and so on are but small steps on the much larger journey to building a better world.

The State of Israel has just turned 61.

It was a day that God made for us. Let us celebrate.

Israel rejected a suggestion by Pope John Paul II for a "special internationally guaranteed status" for Jerusalem "so that one side or the other cannot place it under discrimination." The Pope made the call in an apostolic letter released before Good Friday to Catholics and all people in the Middle East.

CJC Quebec region name change (1)

I would like to acknowledge the foresight of the name change of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, to the Quebec Jewish Congress. Such a change, in my opinion, was a long time due – and for positive reasons ("CJC Quebec Region changes its name," CJN Montreal; "CJC changes its name in Quebec," CJN Toronto, April 8).

As a Jewish Quebecer, I know intuitively that the region that I have decided to make my home is distinct in all of the North American continent. Our region has a special history, civil law system, public institutions and linguistic reality. This unique heritage was acknowledged by Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper last year.

Quebec's Jewish community has been a vital part of this strong and special fabric for nearly 250 years. Parliamentarian Louis-Joseph Papineau secured the legal emancipation of our community in the 1830s. Hitherto, this had only been a dream. To the present, our day schools are among the few within North America that receive subsidies. As an educator of young people and an advocate of teachers within Jewish day schools, I am proud to be part of this unique fabric called "Quebec."

In light of the above, I don't feel better than or inferior to other Canadians. I do, however, feel different and have several tangibles to hang these sentiments on. I, therefore, celebrate the renaming of our organization, which has always been a trailblazer in developing a democratic, gentle, enlightened and special Quebec.

CJC Quebec region name change (2)

When did being Canadian somehow become a matter of opinion? Opinions change, facts don't – or shouldn't until they no longer pass the test of truth. I served as executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, for six years. As it approaches its 90th anniversary, the organization has evidently changed its opinion about being Canadian. On July 1, it will officially change its name to Congrès juif québécois, Section québécoise du Congrès juif canadien or, in English, Quebec Jewish Congress, the Quebec division of Canadian Jewish Congress ("CJC Quebec Region changes its name," CJN Montreal; "CJC changes its name in Quebec," CJN Toronto, April 8).

I have no polemics to propose about federalism, sovereignty, nationalism or any other constitutional option in between, just a suggestion regarding mutual respect and common sense. Mutual respect: there are deep and intertwining roots linking Quebec's Jewish community with its francophone majority. Those roots can be nurtured and deepened by meaningful actions and gestures, not by hastily considered cosmetic name surgery. Mutual respect is based on honesty and sincerity. This name change bears little evidence of either. Common sense: how can an organization that has built its valued legacy on democratic values and transparency swap those values for expediency, without much evidence that it asked its constituents first?

CJC Quebec region name change (3)

The article "CJC Quebec Region changes its name" (CJN Montreal, April 8); "CJC changes its name in Quebec" (CJN Toronto, April 8) states that the reason for the change of name to Congrès juif québécois, Section québécoise du Congrès juif canadien or, in English, Quebec Jewish Congress, the Quebec division of Canadian Jewish Congress "is that we should be more explicitly identified with Quebec, that such a move would be positively perceived."

CJC Quebec region is clearly and explicitly identified with Quebec. It is not clear to me that the name change, which substitutes the word "québécois" for Quebec in the French version and eliminates the word "Canadian" in the first part of the name, but retains it in the last part, makes that identification any clearer.

The article implies that because Jews have lived in Quebec for 249 years and have been an integral part of its society, that the change of name will bring this to the attention of the people of Quebec and make us more welcome. History has taught us that whether we have been in a place for 249 years or are more recent arrivals, the views of xenophobes and racists persist. Changing names, whether personal or organizational, will not protect us. This name change only panders to those who hate and feeds into their prejudices.

We should be proud to tell all who will listen that we in Quebec still are the Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, a staunch supporter of human rights for all Quebeckers.

'We will not allow Holocaust deniers to carry out another Jewish Holocaust'

The following is excerpted from the remarks made by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu at Yad Vashem on Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah on April 20.

"In every generation they rise against us to destroy us; and the Holy One, blessed be He, saves us from their hand." He saves us through the living spirit in our people and its representatives – judges, prophets, kings, Maccabim.

However, in the case of the Holocaust, the rescue came late, too late for six million of our people, and a new flame was rekindled in our remaining survivors only with the establishment of the State of Israel in the Land of Israel.

Anti-Semitism is an age-old historic phenomenon. However, if anyone thought that after the horrors of the Holocaust, this malignant phenomenon would vanish from the world, today it is clear that they were, unfortunately, mistaken. Concurrently with human progress and enlightenment, the dark shadows of hatred are again invading our people and state.

In our generation, only a few dozen years after the Holocaust, new forces arise, clearly and openly stating their intention to wipe the Jewish state off the face of the Earth.

And the response of the civilized world? Instead of a firm denunciation, at best, we hear a faint voice.

The unfortunate fact is that while we are marking the events of the Holocaust here at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, there are those who chose to participate in a spectacle of hatred of Israel, conducted at this very hour in the heart of Europe.

From here I turn to you, President of Switzerland, and I ask you: how can you, as a head of an enlightened state, meet with those who deny the Holocaust and strive for another one?

In opposition to this, we express our appreciation to those important countries which chose to boycott this demonstration of hatred – including the United States, Canada, Germany, Italy, Holland, Poland, Australia and New Zealand, as well as representatives who left the hall during the hateful words of the Iranian president.

We must awaken the nations' conscience, we must form alliances and make connections, but above all, we must remember that our ability to repel the threats to our people's existence stems from the strength of our state, from our unity and our cohesion in times of trial.

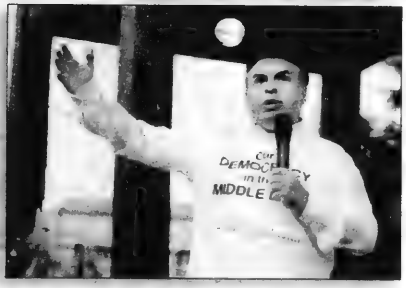
We will not allow Holocaust deniers to carry out another Jewish Holocaust. This is the supreme commitment of the State of Israel, and it is my supreme commitment as Prime Minister of Israel.

The State of Israel is the shield; it is the comfort and hope of the Jewish people. It is where we gather our exiles, where we build new cities in the land of our forefathers, where we create, for the glory of our people and for all mankind.

Israel's achievements in all fields – culture, technology, science, agriculture, medicine and security – are groundbreaking. Our people may be small in number, but of great strength.

The government of Israel has a deep commitment to you, Holocaust survivors. In past years, the state did not always meet your special needs. Over the past several years, things have changed. Today, I guarantee you that we will continue to properly address your needs. You are clear evidence of the transcendence of the Jewish spirit, that spirit which held the power to rise up from the valley of death, return to our homeland and build our lives here.

In the words of Prophet Zachariah: "Thus said HaShem, Master of Legions: My cities will once again spread out with bounty. HaShem will have mercy on Zion once again and He will choose Jerusalem once again."



Thousands of individuals went to Geneva last week to oppose what Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu referred to in his Yad Vashem remarks as "the spectacle of hatred" and to show their support of Israel. Some of the people who spoke and attended a counter-conference last Thursday to the official UN anti-racism gathering in Geneva are seen in the accompanying photos. Clockwise from left are Gil Troy, Alan Dershowitz, Natan Sharansky, Bernard-Henri Lévy, Irwin Cotler and countless supporters of the Jewish state. [Oliver O'hanlon photos]

Opinions

Usurping Jewish history

Rejecting Jewish history and expunging Jewish connectedness to the Land of Israel are cornerstones of the Palestinian Authority's agenda of indoctrination, both past and present. Such contrivance plays itself out in a variety of ways with a focus, in particular, on denying Israel's rights to Jerusalem and Jewish ties to the Temple Mount.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Just a few months ago, Ahmed Qureia, the chief Palestinian negotiator at the 2007 Annapolis Peace Summit, was quoted as saying that "the Jewish Temples never existed, and Israel has been working to 'invent' a Jewish historical connection to Jerusalem." He went on to remark that "the world must be mobilized against all of these Israeli attempts to change the symbols and signs on Jerusalem." And this comes from someone who is regarded as a "moderate" by the United States and Israel.

But when exploring some of the broader premises that the PA uses to distort Israel's link to its past – and thereby to question its very right to exist – Itamar Marcus, director of Palestinian Media Watch, has noted a list of themes articulated by the PA in one of its television programs. These include the notions that the Hebrews of the Bible have no connection to the Jews of today; the Hebrews of the Bible were Arabs; the Prophets of the Bible were Muslims; Solomon's Temple was not built by Israelites but by Arab Canaanites (who were the forefathers of the Palestinians); the Bible is made up of legends based on what Jews imagined and not on history; the Jews of today are descendants of a 13th-century Khazar tribe with no history in the Land of Israel, and Zionism is racism.

The perfidy in all of this is abundantly clear: dissociate Jews from their history and create a fog of unfounded linkages between Palestinian Arabs and an ancient tribe that roamed the Mediterranean coast and Jordan Valley some 5,000 years ago and what you end up with is the absolute fallacy that the Palestinians, and not the Jews, are the legitimate inheritors of modern-day Israel.

And though the motives may not be quite the same, the recent dispute that has erupted over ownership of the Dead Sea Scrolls – which promises to provide a flashpoint when the scrolls arrive at Toronto's Royal Ontario Museum in July – speaks similarly to an undisguised attempt by the PA to usurp an essential and irrefutable testament not only to Jewish origins but to a geographic localization that confers presence and possession to the Jews of that era. How outrageous it is that the PA is demanding custody of these treasures.

Three special days

Almost immediately after Pesach, we mark three important dates here in Israel that are delicately intertwined. Yom Hashoah is commemorated exactly a week before Yom Hazikaron, which is observed the day before Yom Ha'atzmaut. The theme of the three is "from Holocaust to resurrection." The subtext is that independence would not have been achieved without the calamity of the Holocaust or the sacrifices of our war dead.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

With Israel-bashers equating the Israel Defence Forces with the Nazis and anti-Zionist and anti-Semitic fervour increasingly prevalent around the globe, it's worth dwelling on these three days.

Yom Hashoah and Yom Hazikaron are sombre occasions. On the eve of both, all restaurants, cafes, theatres and like institutions are closed. All music broadcasted is sober. At specific hours on both days, sirens wail throughout the country, traffic stops and everyone stands in silence, remembering the victims and the fallen.

Yom Hashoah commemorations are held in schools and public places, most notably at Yad Vashem and in two kibbutzim – Yad Mordechai, named after the leader of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, Mordechai Anilevitch, and Lochamei HaGhetta'ot, founded in 1949 by surviving rebels of the Warsaw Ghetto, partisans, concentration camp survivors and other who hid during those terrible years.

During the day, the media airs Holocaust-related movies and documentaries and interviews with survivors.

Yom Hazikaron is similar in its gravity, if not its universality. It, too, is very solemn, with observances at educational institutions and military cemeteries. On radio and TV, we learn of battles, some that went wrong, and of heroics told by comrades-in-arms, parents, widows and children.

When I commanded military units, I took my soldiers to battle sites and particular graveyards on Yom Hazikaron. The most moving and beautiful cemetery I visited is in Kiryat Anavim, a kibbutz in the corridor leading from the coast to Jerusalem. The common graves of dozens of soldiers, some literally just off the boat from the inferno of Europe, all killed on successive days of the War of Independence, tell of the warriors' bravery and of the enormity of the sacrifice.

For some Israelis, Yom Hazikaron hits much closer to home than Yom Hashoah. Almost everyone knows someone killed or injured in action.

Despite this, I have often felt the order of the two days should be reversed, with Yom Hashoah observed on the day before Yom Ha'atzmaut and Yom Hazikaron a week earlier. That might not jive chronologically, but it would substantively.

Notwithstanding the unthinkable pain of the deaths of loved ones in Israel's wars and battles, it's dwarfed by the magnitude of the suffering, both personal and collective, caused by the Holocaust. The latter was Israel's constitutive event. Without it, the nations of the world would never have voted at the United Nations for the creation of a Jewish state. As such, its commemoration should have been more closely linked to the celebration of Israel's birth, with the loss of our soldiers, albeit terribly heartbreaking, receiving a less central role.

Don't misunderstand. We must also remember each of our fallen soldiers and support their families. Their supreme sacrifice enabled us to realize the dream of statehood and maintain that achievement since 1948.

The order of things won't be reversed. Holocaust remembrance is given its rightful place in Israel's being. The IDF, the country's most integrative and unifying organization, recognizes its importance. Each year, it sends thousands of soldiers to Poland to partake in a project aptly named "Uniformed Witnesses." This year on Yom Hashoah, 10,000 soldiers and officers visited the homes of Holocaust survivors, giving each flowers and a certificate.

Grotesque comparisons between Nazi evils and IDF actions abound. Those who brand us demons desire Israel's eradication. The ongoing debate about the distinction between anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism becomes moot. Jews are blamed for Israel's actions. And what would they be blamed for if there were no Israel? For being Jews?

A strong, independent Israel, with men and women willing to die to ensure it stays that way, is not always right, nor always pretty. But it occupies the moral high ground. It's accountable for its acts and omissions and always soul-searching. This is a lesson of the Holocaust, and this is what Yom Hashoah, Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut are all about.

Durban II: Canada did the right thing

In early 2008, Canada was the first – and for many months – the only country to say that it would not participate in another UN-sponsored anti-Israel and anti-Semitic conference under the façade of opposing racism. In April 2009, that decision proved to be the right one.

It wasn't prophetic, it was just that the Canadian government – Prime Minister Stephen Harper, along with opposition leaders who joined in this extraordinary bipartisan decision – understood the realities of international politics. Canada had a major role in, and responsibility for, the catastrophic 2001 UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, which singled out Israel for attack and took place in an atmosphere of vicious anti-Semitism and hatred. But the lessons were learned, and this wasn't going to be repeated.

Gerald Steinberg in Geneva

When Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad opened this year's Durban Review Conference, dubbed Durban II, by making claims that Jewish suffering in the Holocaust has been exaggerated and referring to Israel with terms such as "racist" and "apartheid," Canadian officials didn't have to walk out – they were never there. Neither were representatives from Israel, the United States, Italy, Germany, Australia and four other countries. While not the massive show of disdain for the Durban process that should have taken place had all the democracies joined, the empty seats in the conference room were quite visible.

Even without Ahmadinejad, the conference was doomed to failure. From the beginning, with Libya as chair and Iran as vice-chair, the tone was set – this was going to be another platform for Israel-bashing and attacks on free speech and democracy. It was only in the past month that UN officials realized that they might have made a mistake and tried to remove some of the worst poison from the conference's draft declaration. By this time, U.S. President Barack Obama had followed Canada and Israel in deciding not to take part, after two negotiators sent to try to change the text came back empty-handed.

Ottawa came under attack for its position on Durban II from a variety of non-governmental organizations, such as Amnesty International, that claim to speak on behalf of oppressed minorities and victims of discrimination. Ken Roth, the head of the powerful Human Rights Watch (HRW), came to Ottawa recently and in media interviews, he arrogantly rebuked the government for its principled position. HRW was also guilty of involvement in the 2001 Durban conference, but it learned no lessons. In a statement issued the day after Ahmadinejad's appearance – which took place on Holocaust Memorial Day – HRW again condemned the countries that refused to give this absurd conference the legitimacy of their participation, but HRW didn't even mention Ahmadinejad's speech.

The Canadian policy of not providing funds for NGOs to participate in the 2009 conference also marked an important and principled departure. In 2001 at Durban, thousands of NGO members, ostensibly sent to contribute to action plans against racism, turned into racists themselves, carrying signs and chanting that "Zionism is racism." In addition to the decision by Canada regarding NGO funding, the powerful Ford Foundation adopted the same policy, and the presence of radical NGOs in the streets of Geneva during the review conference was greatly reduced. These activities were primarily led by groups such as North South 21, which is linked to the Libyan government and has little credibility.

In contrast, having learned the lessons from 2001, this time, Jewish pro-Israel and pro-human rights activists came in large numbers and made sure that Ahmadinejad was not made to feel welcome when he came and left the building. In addition, speeches by Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel, Canadian Liberal MP Irwin Cotler and Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz, as well as a very moving Holocaust Memorial Day ceremony opposite the UN building in Geneva, served to offset the bitterness of events inside.

While one success doesn't mean that the entire mechanism of anti-Israel boycotts, lawsuits and NGO campaigns under the façade of fighting racism has been defeated, this is an important precedent. It's now possible to at least visualize and work toward a new beginning for these moral principles, which would help the real victims of racism – in Darfur, Rwanda, and many other places. Canada has marked the path, and for this, we are all grateful.

The Kirshner File

The missile threat to Israel

Prior to last winter's war in the Gaza Strip, residents of Israeli cities who had never experienced the terror of Qassam missiles were warned that such rockets might soon reach them as well.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

On Dec. 12, two weeks before the war erupted, the Israeli army advised the people of Ashdod to prepare themselves for that possibility. Eleven days later, when Ashdod and neighbouring Kiryat Gat held their first ever rocket attack drills, Yuval Diskin, the director of the Shin Bet, Israel's internal intelligence service, observed that Palestinian missiles could hit major communities in both the southern coastal plain and the northern Negev, including Be'er Sheva.

True to his sombre prediction, Israeli cities and towns that had never borne the brunt of Qassam attacks took hits during the war.

Israel launched its three-week land, air and sea offensive, dubbed Operation Cast Lead, to silence the missile threat from Gaza, from which Israel withdrew unilaterally in 2005.

The air force initiated the assault, bombing strategic targets in Gaza, but the missile barrage continued unabated.

The army then sent in an invading force, hoping to batter Hamas' military infrastructure, but to no avail. Even after hostilities ceased, Hamas kept firing missiles into Israel, underscoring the fact that Israel has no credible defence against short-range enemy rockets.

Israel has begun to develop a missile defence system, the Iron Dome. But as Israel's state comptroller, Micha Lindenstrauss, wrote recently in a scathing report, the Iron Dome is still in its development stage.

Israel's vulnerability to rocket attack, highlighted by the inconclusive war in Gaza, is actually an old story.

During the 1950s and 1960s, kibbutzim in the Jordan Valley were shelled periodically by Syria from bases on the Golan Heights.

On the eve of the Six Day War, Jordan fired artillery and mortar rounds into western Jerusalem.

Subsequently, Israeli settlements in the Jordan Valley and the Hula Valley were struck by the PLO.

Syrian gunners hit kibbutzim in the Galilee as the Yom Kippur War raged. Israel invaded Lebanon in 1982, citing the need to stop the PLO from firing Katyushas at communities near the Lebanese border.

In 1991, Saddam Hussein, the president of Iraq, ordered his forces to target Israel. Thirty nine Iraqi Scud missiles crashed into Israel, causing fairly serious property damage in Tel Aviv and leading thousands of its inhabitants to flee to safer ground.

In deference to a U.S. request to stay out of the Gulf War, Israel exercised restraint. Washington rushed Patriot air defence batteries to Israel, but they were largely ineffective.

Shortly after the outbreak of the second intifadah, when Gaza was still occupied by Israel, Hamas began firing Qassam rockets and mortars into the town of Sderot and nearby communities.

The Israeli army conducted retaliatory incursions into Gazan towns and refugee camps, but the rocket attacks continued unabated.

By that point, Hamas, thanks to Iran's help, had refined the range and potency of its homegrown Qassams.

The 2006 war in Lebanon was a striking example of the clear and present threat that rockets pose to Israel's security today.

Despite Israeli air power, and a brief Israeli ground assault into southern Lebanon, Hezbollah managed to launch almost 4,000 rockets into Israel. They hit towns, such as Haifa and Hadera, that had previously been immune to such attacks.

Israel had no effective response, and still does not.

Last year, Ehud Olmert, then Israel's prime minister, issued a stern warning that Israel's next war with Hezbollah would involve the home front. He warned that Hezbollah missiles "will reach the cities and homes of Israel's citizens."

Meir Dagan, director of the Mossad, Israel's external intelligence service, sounded a similar theme in a reference to Hezbollah's capabilities. As he put it, "The risk of damage to home front targets is very high."

Matan Vilnai, the deputy defence minister, was even more emphatic. Asked last October what the next war will look like, he replied, "The home front will be the main front of the war, whether it is missiles from Gaza, Lebanon, Syria or Iran." In an ominous postscript, he added, "We can get hit and be weakened. They can try to hit us hard."

Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, a cabinet minister in the present Israeli government, said last summer that "hundreds of missiles will strike Israel" in the opening phase of a future war. "There will be no place in the country which is not within range of Syria and Hezbollah rockets," he noted. And referring to the possibility that Hamas may yet succeed in smuggling rockets into the West Bank and firing them at central Israel, he said, "We're going to start getting rockets in Ramle."

Be'er Sheva, the largest town in the Negev, was struck by Qassam missiles during the recent war in Gaza [Sheldon Kirshner photo]

Taking these variables into consideration, Yossi Alpher, an Israeli analyst and former Mossad agent, has written, "Militarily, Israel has already entered an era in which wars and conflict are characterized increasingly by enemy missile… attacks aimed at terrorizing the civilian rear. Iran, Syria, Al Qaeda and both Lebanese and Palestinian extremist groups linked with Iran are all likely to step up their efforts to attack Israel [with] missiles."

For the past few years, Israel has been trying to develop an answer to the threat posed by short-range, medium-range and long-range missiles. The Iron Dome, which can intercept short-range missiles, is being developed by the Israeli company Rafael Advanced Defence Systems. It was tested successfully last summer and is due to come online in the summer of 2010.

An Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank may well hinge on its deployment. Ehud Barak, the defence minister, has said that an Iron Dome system is a prerequisite for such a pullout.

Alongside the Iron Dome, Rafael and an American firm, Raytheon, are working on the Laser Air Defence System (LADS), which may be the last word in short-range missile interception. In addition, Israel is developing two systems to counter medium-range missiles, the Stunner and David's Sling, both of which may be ready by 2013.

Israel has already introduced the Arrow system, which is designed to intercept long-range missiles from Iran and works in tandem with the Green Pine radar system.

Co-developed with the United States, the Arrow was first deployed in 2000. Israel is currently working on an upgraded version, the Arrow-3, which is supposedly capable of downing Iran's Shihab-3 ballistic missile.

In the meantime, the United States has deployed a high-powered radar system in the Negev, manned by 120 U.S. soldiers, which can detect a missile shortly after launch.

Although Israel has begun to reinforce buildings within Arab missile range, the former deputy defence minister, Ephraim Sneh, has charged that the Home Front Command receives inadequate funding. "The most elementary aspects of the home front are neglected," he claimed two years ago. The state comptroller, Micha Lindenstrauss, has also been critical. Two years ago, he wrote, "Israel's administrations – the political and executive echelons – have not carried out their duties [on] the home front."

Last year, Raanan Dinur, the director-general of the prime minister's office, had to admit that, due to budgetary reasons, buildings in communities near Gaza still remain unprotected. Israel is thus still vulnerable to hostile missile fire.

'Morah Yoga' brings kinesthetic learning to kids

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Kinneret Dubowitz is sometimes called "Morah Yoga" by her little students at Torah Tots Preschool. The name is probably even more unusual than Dubowitz's area of expertise, at least in the context of an Orthodox school.

For the past four years, the 35-year-old dance therapist has been teaching yoga and creative movement once a week at the preschool, housed at Chabad of Markham.

She teaches the same type of class once a week at Netivot HaTorah Day School, where she is known as Morah Kinneret, and has also taught at Gan Shalom Preschool and Mesorah Montessori, another Orthodox school. In the summer, she works at Chabad Lubavitch Day Camp and Neshama Theatre Troupe's summer program. She also teaches yoga to women in private classes and runs Jewish-focused wellness retreats.

In an interview at her home – over a cup of organic kukicha tea, a type of green tea derived from twigs – Dubowitz discussed her work and the journey that led her to integrate yoga and Orthodox Judaism.

A dancer and competitive gymnast as a youngster growing up in Toronto, the South African-born Dubowitz became more religiously observant after participating at age 19 in Livnot U'Lehibanot, a year-long volunteer program in Israel, and studying comparative religion studies at the University of Toronto.

She was certified as a yoga teacher in 1996 by the Toronto School of Flow Yoga, and she received her master's in creative arts and dance movement therapy in 2000 from Lesley College in Boston.

Dubowitz worked as a dance therapist in the United States before returning to Toronto at age 28 with her American-born husband, Menachem Feuer, who teaches at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

For Orthodox yoga students, Dubowitz believes "it's important to have a religious person teaching them." Chanting, for example, can be an issue if names of Hindu gods are used, she noted.

Yoga per se is not incompatible with Orthodoxy, "as long as it's done with boundaries," Dubowitz said.

At Torah Tots, the mother of two boys, ages five and seven, integrates school themes into creative movement, often coming up with new yoga poses or adapting existing ones to fit the themes.

"On Purim, we become the shalach manos baskets," she said. "We become the licorice that bends, the pretzels that cross our legs, the popcorn that pops."

Dubowitz, who wrote a thesis about the integration of Jewish education and kinesthetic learning, said that she was the type of kid who "had a lot of trouble sitting at a desk."

Although she did well in school, she found it frustrating, she said.

In addition to providing kinesthetic learning, Dubowitz believes she is helping to break stereotypes. "I think it's important for kids to see Orthodox Jewish women who are connected to their bodies."

She said that the long skirt she wears does not restrict her movement or prevent her from "crawling around with the kids."

She hopes that because the children have fun in her class, they will associate body movement with fun and will also have positive memories of their Jewish schooling.

Yoga is "an incredible balance between structure and expression," Dubowitz said. "There's a lot of containment and a lot of freedom."

A lesson from the teacher: "The body has wisdom, and not every child learns just cerebrally. Many children need to use the wisdom of the body in order to engage with the world around them. Exposure to a variety of motor experiences is really important."

CIPP leader honoured for humanitarian work

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When members of the Jewish and Somali communities held a press conference last year to announce a mentorship program, Mark Persaud was there to lend his support.

Though neither Jewish nor Somali, Persaud was instrumental in bringing the two sides together in an effort to promote goodwill between two communities that, at first blush, might not be considered the most natural of allies.

Mark Persaud

Persaud, president of the Canadian International Peace Project (CIPP), an organization that fosters pluralism and inter-community relationships, said that ever since the terrorist attacks of 9/11, he had "looked for an opportunity to bring Jews and Muslims together and build relationships at the organizational level."

His efforts to promote inter-community goodwill will be recognized at a tribute dinner May 7, as CIPP and Friends of Mark Persaud "celebrate 25 years of exceptional contributions and public service to Canada."

At the joint news conference, held at a west-end public school, Canadian Jewish Congress and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto joined the Canadian Somali Congress to announce the mentoring program, which will see Jewish professionals help young Somalis – potential community leaders – as they enter the workforce.

Somalis are the largest diaspora African community in Canada and they practise a moderate form of Islam, Persaud explained. Many Somalis have had contact with Jews – especially those in the legal profession – as they try to establish themselves in the country, he added.

Persaud credited Ed Morgan, former president of Canadian Jewish Congress, and James Morton, past president of the Ontario Bar Association, for laying the groundwork for the program's ultimate success. Both are honorary patrons of the Somali Congress board.

"This is a beaker for a very interesting social experiment in seeing how far we can go to build bridges," Persaud said. "The whole thing is cutting edge. I'm very proud of it. It shows what can happen if you bring together people of goodwill."

One immediate spinoff of the mentoring project, which is supported by Canadian Heritage, is the desire by several Somali women and young people to give something back to the Jewish community. CIPP staff is working on a proposed project for June that would see Somalis visit seniors at the Baycrest Centre and share their foods, culture and songs. At the same time, the Somalis will hear about Jewish culture, religion and immigration experience, Persaud said.

While actual mentoring hasn't yet begun, the program has the potential to expand to other communities. Persaud has received feelers from two influential Pakistani businessmen interested in introducing it to their community, and non-Muslims have also expressed an interest, he said.

Persaud believes building personal relationships is the key to establishing inter-community ties. Doing so seems to come easily to the Guyanese-born activist, Morgan said. "The force of his personality" is an ingredient in Persaud's success. "He's a very likeable guy. He's been outspoken on the plight of visible minorities in the federal civil service," and that drew the attention of minority groups.

"He makes a point of befriending community leaders" and he has extensive contacts in numerous cultural communities, Morgan added.

Businessman Nathan Jacobson, who hosted Persaud on a trip to Ukraine and Israel, said, "Mark Persaud is a well-intentioned, selfless and principled person. He is trying to work out of the box. He is a big supporter of Israel."

As a youth growing up in Guyana, Persaud didn't know any Jews. Raised in the Hindu faith, he was taught to have an open mind and to be tolerant of other religions and races.

In 1983, when he was 19, his family fled political and civil upheaval in Guyana. He came to Canada as a refugee with the equivalent of $80 in his pocket.

He attended Osgoode Hall law school and worked as a federal prosecutor for 10 years. He also served as legal counsel to the RCMP for two years, and along the way, worked in community outreach projects.

He left law and "decided to come back to this. I believe I bring a perspective and understanding that are needed in terms of building relationships to move our communities together."

A teenage convert to Christianity, Persaud boasts a family of such diversity he could be a poster boy for multiculturalism. One of his sisters married an American and is a Protestant, another married a Muslim and is raising her children in that faith, and a third sister married an American Roman Catholic and is raising their children as Catholics.

A brother married an African-American Christian, and Persaud is so close to several American Jews, he considers them his siblings.

"In my family we have Hindus, Protestants, Roman Catholics, Jews, blacks, whites and browns," he said.

"The fluff of multiculturalism" – the songs and dances – doesn't interest him so much as its substance, which means "bringing friends, family, together with a deeper appreciation of other peoples."

The legal aspects of multiculturalism – the laws which mandate it – "have their usefulness, but we're reached the point where we have to move beyond the traditional role of multiculturalism to integration and communities working together to build a stronger Canada," he said.

Receive up to $1,500 towards camp fees!

In 1957, Barry and Philomena Lowes pursued their dream and founded Camp Timberlane, a residential summer camp located on a private lake in Haliburton Ontario. Their vision was to create a camping experience that would build confidence, spirit and leadership. They strived to provide a nurturing environment that would recognize a person's uniqueness and where values would be learned that would benefit them over a lifetime. The tradition continues today and is being carried on for future generations by the present Director and owner Corey Mandell.

After 52 years, Barry and Phil are committed more than ever to their life pursuit of making camping available to the new generations of children. To make this possible, they have created "Share the Magic"; an endowment with the sole objective of introducing new campers to the Timberlane experience.

Poland's chief rabbi set to visit

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Since the fall of Communism 20 years ago, thousands of people in Poland who were brought up as Catholics have discovered their Jewish ancestry, says the country's chief rabbi.

"Thousands of Poles who did not know they had Jewish roots have found them," said Rabbi Michael Schudrich, who will deliver a speech in Toronto on Poland's Jewish revival on May 11 at Congregation Habonim.

Invited here by the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada, the rabbi said that such Poles have voiced an interest in "learning about their Jewish heritage and expressing it in some positive manner."

Rabbi Schudrich, who has played a pivotal role in Poland's Jewish renaissance, said that Jews who were once afraid to tell their children or grandchildren about their Jewish origins have spoken up since the advent of democracy in Poland.

"We have only begun to reach out to those who are now discovering their true Jewish identity," he said in an interview.

And much remains to be done in consolidating the ongoing Jewish revival. As he put it, "We need more rabbis and teachers to teach and share [Jewish knowledge] with more people."

He singled out the Ronald Lauder Foundation for having supported this revival. Funded by American businessman Ronald Lauder, the foundation has built Jewish schools, community centres and summer camps throughout Poland and eastern Europe.

Rabbi Schudrich added that the major funder of Poland's Jewish renaissance today is the U.S.-based Taube Foundation for Jewish Life and Culture.

In his judgment, the Polish Jewish community is dependent on philanthropy.

"It is essential for two reasons. First, it provides material help that is so necessary. Second, it shows we are not forgotten."

Rabbi Michael Schudrich

Rabbi Schudrich, an American of Polish Jewish descent, praised the Polish government for supporting the revival.

"There is an understanding that Jews have lived in Poland for almost 1,000 years, have been part of this country for centuries and have contributed. The desire is not to let this die out."

Rabbi Schudrich, who was appointed to his position by the Union of Jewish Communities in Poland, said there are no firm figures as to the number of Jews living in Poland today.

"The estimate is usually somewhere around 30,000 to 40,000, but no one really knows, since people are still discovering their Jewish roots."

Asked what challenges face the community at present, he replied, "The main ones are to help Poles of Jewish descent return to their Jewish identity, to build a Jewish community with people who were not brought up as Jews and to balance the needs of the present with the memory of the past."

Asked if anti-Semitism is a serious problem, he said, "Anti-Semitism exists in Poland, as it tragically exists throughout Europe. There is little physical anti-Semitism in Poland, and it is certainly a lot less problematic than in places like Paris. Having said that, now is the time to fight anti-Semitism before it grows."

The rabbi added that both the Polish government and the president have been "very, very strong" in fighting it.

In closing, he said the Polish government has yet to resolve the Jewish private property issue.

Jewish community property seized by the Nazis and Communists has been returned, but not so private Jewish property.

Urging Poland to act on this matter, he said, "The government has a responsibility to all those who lost property. They should receive something for their properties."

Rabbi Schudrich, born in New York City in 1955, is a graduate of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America and Yeshiva University.

From 1983 to 1989, he served as rabbi of Japan's Jewish community.

He began working for the Ronald Lauder Foundation in 1992 and resided in Warsaw until 1998. Returning to Poland two years later, he was appointed chief rabbi in 2004.

Jewish frat marks 100th anniversary

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Canadian alumni of Sigma Alpha Mu (SAM), a Jewish fraternity that's celebrating its 100th anniversary this year, will be observing the milestone in Toronto with a celebratory dinner in May.

The fraternity, which was founded in 1909 by eight Jewish students at City College in New York because they weren't welcome at existing fraternities, has attracted thousands of Canadian alumni over the years.

While the fraternity hasn't been exclusively Jewish since 1953, it continues to honour its roots by acting on Jewish principles and values.

Bill Schwartz, the international fraternity's executive director emeritus, who was a brother at the University of Oklahoma in the class of 1952, said there are no active Canadian chapters at the moment, but the fraternity has a rich history in Canadian schools, including at the University Western Ontario, University of Toronto, McGill University and the University of Manitoba.

"Our first Canadian chapter was at McGill in 1918. Toronto was [started in] 1920, and we had quite a group from Manitoba," Schwartz said.

Jerry Nesker, who joined SAM in 1966 as a freshman at U of T, said Canadian alumni are very proud of their fellow members.

"We have Supreme Court justices, Superior Court justices, lawyers, accountants, members of both provincial and federal parliaments, industry leaders, philanthropists and entrepreneurs who have shared membership in Sigma Alpha Mu," Nesker said.

Some notable alumni include former chief justice of Canada Bora Laskin, current Supreme Court Justice Marshall Rothstein and billionaire businessman Gerald Schwartz.

Nesker and his wife, Carol, are hosting the Toronto celebration dinner at the Premiere Ballroom in Richmond Hill on May 9.

Representatives from the national organization will be present, speeches will be given, and an award will be presented to Toronto-based philanthropist Joseph Tanenbaum, an alumnus who is being honoured for his commitment to community service.

Nesker said he and his wife wanted to organize a dinner in Toronto to give Canadian alumni an opportunity to reacquaint themselves with brothers they may have lost touch with over the years.

(Nesker, on the other hand, said he's still in close touch with one of his fraternity brothers who introduced him to his wife more than three decades ago.)

Bill Schwartz said that rather than having one big convention, the 100-year milestone is being celebrated with dinners in a number of North American cities – including Phoenix, Atlanta, Chicago, Baltimore and Dallas – in order to make it more accessible to alumni everywhere.

Both Nesker and Schwartz hope to raise awareness about what the fraternity is really about and challenge the reputation that fraternities have when it comes to drinking and partying.

"There are people who say that fraternities are snobby and not egalitarian, and they do things like hazing and all that stuff," Schwartz said.

But community service and philanthropic work is characteristic of the fraternity, he added.

He recalled a scholarship program that some of the Canadian chapters were involved with that brought European Jews to Canada before the Holocaust.

"In the early '30s, the national chaplain of Canada heard, before Kristallnacht, that the Jews were being treated badly," Schwartz said.

European Jews were sponsored by the chapters to live and study in Canada.

"The chapter whose alumni sponsored more refugees than any other was the chapter at the University of Manitoba," he said, adding that altogether, about 40 Jews were brought to Canada through this initiative.

"It was a trickle. It was extremely hard to get refugees out of Germany. At one point it became impossible... It was wonderful for those 40 people, but there were six million others. We did our best."

For more information about the centennial celebrations, call Schwartz at 317-846-0600, or e-mail him at samfdn@sam.org.

Jewish Life

Background to a name change

By VICTOR GOLDBLOOM

Guest Voice

Let me begin by making clear what the media have not: our new name is Quebec Jewish Congress, A DIVISION OF CANADIAN JEWISH CONGRESS. We have not concealed or diminished our commitment to the Canada-wide organization, nor to Canada.

In recent years, repeated public opinion polls have shown that the Jewish community is less well regarded in Canada than in the United States, and less well regarded in Quebec than in other parts of Canada.

We had two choices: to shrug our shoulders and accept this reality, or to analyze it and devise a strategy for coping with it.

Is Quebec an anti-Semitic society? Our analysis says no. It reveals, however, that our community is little known, and what is known is often inaccurate. Yes, there is anti-Semitism – and we must be vigilant and react to it whenever it rears its head – but it is far less than it was when I was growing up, and it no longer has any political or religious endorsement.

What anti-Semitism there is, however, grabbed the microphone at the public consultations of the Bouchard-Taylor Commission on reasonable accommodation of minorities, and made a strategy all the more necessary. As well, in the debate, all minorities tended to be lumped together, whether they began to grow in the last decade or two or, in our case, have been here for 2-1/2 centuries. It is not in our interest to be perceived as a foreign body within Quebec society.

In the aftermath of the presentation of our brief to Gérard Bouchard and Charles Taylor, I decided to undertake a speaking tour of the province. I have been to Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu, Drummondville, Trois-Rivières, Quebec City, Joliette, Valleyfield and Mont-Laurier, and I had a session with a group of former members of the national assembly. As well, Congress recently held a demonstration seder in Saint Agathe.

This has been a thoroughly positive experience, and I have every intention of continuing it.

I speak about our community, beginning with its 249 years as an integral part of Quebec society. I speak of its diversity, of its growth through immigration from Europe, and more recently from North Africa, and of its talents. I respond candidly to the questions I am asked.

I enter these encounters with two hopes, and so far they have been fulfilled every time. People tell me two things: "I learned a lot about your community, and your religion, that I didn't know," and "You corrected a lot of wrong impressions that I had had before." Most rewarding, however, is when they say, "Goodness, you're Quebecers just like us."

It's the feedback from these and other encounters, from conversations with public figures and from interviews with the media that caused us to reflect on our name. The designation Quebec region got a lot of negative reaction, because, indeed, we are not a region, we are a province that has regions of its own.

We felt, therefore, that we would have more positive impact on public opinion, on the leadership of this province and on journalists if we underlined our integration into Quebec society. Our board was unanimous, the two national co-presidents were strong in their support, and the national board endorsed the change with a single dissenting vote.

The mention of the change was applauded in Saint Agathe. The mayor of Montreal went out of his way to congratulate us. The national assembly adopted a unanimous motion of felicitation. We feel that we have made a constructive decision that will significantly serve the best interests of our community.

Victor Goldbloom is chair of the Quebec Jewish Congress, a division of Canadian Jewish Congress, and has been active in Congress for 43 years.

Will we be people of the gigabyte?

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

"Is Google making us stupid?" muses Nicholas Carr, one of the current gurus of information technology. Complaining that over the past few years he has had an uncomfortable sense that something has been tinkering with his brain, Carr laments what he sees as his diminished ability to hang in there with a longish piece of writing – forget about War and Peace or, heaven forbid, Marcel Proust – and he traces this loss to his constant foraging in the jungles of the Internet.

It appears that Carr is not alone in wondering whether his cognitive abilities have been mislaid in cyberspace. According to a recent and comprehensive report conducted by researchers at University College London, we are in the midst of a revolution in the way we read and think. A five-year research study emphatically concludes that a growing majority of young people prefer reading online than in actual book form. And how does web surfing interact with reading? "It is clear that users are not reading online in the traditional sense; indeed there are signs that new forms of 'reading' are emerging as users 'power browse' horizontally through titles, contents pages and abstracts going for quick wins. It almost seems that they go online to avoid reading in the traditional sense."

None of this should be news. In the 1960s, the great early prophet of the information age, Marshall McLuhan, warned that media doesn't simply supply the content of thought, it also shapes the way we process and contemplate thought itself. In "the medium is the message," he was eerily prescient about what it would be like not just to use but to think in Google.

A lack of patience, a quickness to judge, a fatigue with extensive argumentation, an inability to sit still with difficult passages – many is the teacher who has silently noted these features as part of the intellectual profile of the majority of today's students. Indeed, being a stickler in the fight against such traits renders one a quaint (or annoying) relic of the world before Yahoo.

As Carr notes, "My mind now expects to take in information the way the Net distributes it: in swiftly moving stream of particles. Once I was a scuba diver in the sea of words. Now I zip along the surface like a guy on a Jet Ski."

We are only just beginning to understand what effects this will have in the realm of Jewish education, traditionally an area reserved for intense textual study, commentary and metacommentary, and extensive and exhaustive analysis of words. Jews have had a centuries-old love affair with books. Will we now become the "people of the gigabyte?"

Advocates will argue, correctly, that there are obvious advantages to the new technologies in terms of speed and access. The question is whether they will render impotent the overall desire for actual book learning, or simply convert all of that information into other modes of delivery, making Jewish literacy more, not less, universal.

All of this remains to be seen. For the moment – oops, my allotted space is just about up. I have to get back to YouTube. (Full disclosure: I accessed the London study through the friendly auspices of Google.)

Jewish pilgrims journey to Jerusalem

Laish by Aharon Appelfeld, Random House.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This brief novel tells the astonishing story of a group of Jewish pilgrims on their way to Jerusalem from eastern Europe in the closing years of the 19th century.

The pilgrims, crowded into a caravan of six horse-drawn wagons, are wondrously diverse: devout and learned elderly men, misfits, widows and orphans, adventurers, thieves and con men. Also, abusive and often drunken wagon drivers, some of them former convicts. The violent drivers accept, to a limited degree, the authority of the elders, but for the most part, they bring practical, worldly-wise leadership to the bewildered, frightened and grief-stricken travellers.

The pilgrimage, now many years old, has experienced a variety of difficulties and misfortunes: a typhoid epidemic, brutal quarrels and harsh weather, as well as the hostility and resentment of the peasants in the towns and villages through which they pass.

Laish, the novel's narrator, a 15-year-old orphan, is confronted with experiences that are often violent, inexplicable and sometimes grotesque. He is a keen observer of events and intelligent, but unable to fully explain or comprehend the actions or behaviour patterns of those about him.

Appelfeld, one of Israel's best-known and admired authors, writes in a terse, unadorned style. His sentences tend to be short and simply constructed. As a result, the reader often feels that there is something missing, some elusive element that is being withheld.

The author is best when he depicts character or personality. Laish says this about a friend among the travellers: "Animals are Struel's great love. Apart from the falcon that alights on his shoulder every evening and sleeps in his lap, he has two German shepherds who are utterly devoted to him. Any animal that encounters him will nestle against him.

"In Lemberg he saved us from a pack of stray dogs. He knows how to take care of sick horses, doves, and even snakes. The old men are fond of him, occasionally calling him up to read from the Torah. Were he not addicted to drink, they would be even fonder of him."

At one point, Laish gloomily observes that wagons have emptied out, and loosened knapsacks and parcels are strewn alongside the wagons. Clothes that once covered people lie torn and shameful on the ground. Shimkeh and Chiyuk were the sole witnesses to the disappearances. Who knows the fate of these people? If Shimkeh is asked where the missing are gone, he waves his hand as if he were about to bring down a horsewhip on rebellious animal and spits to the side.

Finally, a remnant, emotionally and physically drained, reach the port city of Galacz, where their ship is waiting in the harbour. But there are unexpected problems. Will the ship sail? Is the long trek over?

The basic meaning of this affecting work can be interpreted in many ways. Perhaps most comfortably as an allegory, a symbolic re-creation of the age-old quest of Jews for Jerusalem – actual or heavenly.

Above all, this provocative book testifies to human tenacity and resilience. Despite formidable odds, a desperate few achieve their goal. But the way was long and hard and the price was high in pain and death. Does the author think of human life in these terms?

Business ethics in tough times, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, we continue to look at what Judaism has to say about business ethics in tough times. Before getting to the issues, the Business Ethics Center of Jerusalem puts some points in perspective about Judaism's view of business. .

- Unlike other traditions, Judaism has never viewed poverty as a virtue. Wealth, however, has always been seen as a challenge.
- The imperative of integrity demands honesty, even when it is contrary to business advantage.
- Judaism recognizes that ethics can only exist where there is an effective and respected legal infrastructure. Ethics, however, go beyond law and can be defined as "obedience to the unenforceable." [tinyurl.com/ethics11]

Stay on the Business Ethics site for many thoughtful articles, including a proposed Halachic Corporate Code of Ethics. [tinyurl.com/ethics12]

In light of the Bernard Madoff scandal (he has been convicted of operating a Ponzi scheme that has been called the largest investor fraud ever committed by a single person), Rabbi Asher Meir asks, "Can individuals and institutions be faulted for investing with a seemingly upright and reliable person?" He tells about Rav Ashi, who sent a message to another sage asking for 10 zuzzim (ancient silver coins) for an investment. The response: "Bring witnesses and let us write a deed." Rav Ashi sent back, "Even for me?" The sage sent back, "Especially you, for you are preoccupied with Torah learning and likely to forget, and I would bring a curse on myself." Rabbi Meir suggests that no one is immune from the discipline of documentation. As for the Madoff affair, Rabbi Meir says "While many people relied on the investment manager's reputation and considered him above suspicion, others were convinced that he was engaged in misconduct but didn't mean because they imagined that he was doing so on their behalf. As they learned, this is not only unethical but also naive." [tinyurl.com/ethics13]

Rabbi Yizchok Breitowitz asks if declaring bankruptcy is a kosher choice under Halachah. He points out that "the Torah considers the obligation to pay debts as absolute… and there is no mechanism in Halachah that is tantamount to escaping your debts by filing a bankruptcy and obtaining a discharge." But since we live in a secular country, are we "allowed to file bankruptcy [and] get a discharge?" The answer seems be "yes," but the fascinating part of the article is rabbi's explanation of the rights of the lender and debtor in secular and Jewish societies – as well as the role of the Jewish community toward individuals who find themselves in financial distress. [tinyurl.com/ethics14]

Rabbi Jay Kelman of Torah in Motion looks at many issues, including: Can executive salaries be clawed back; may one invest in corporations whose activities may be ethically wanting; should tzedakah be returned if the donor earned funds through illegal activities? [tinyurl.com/ethics15]

Another excellent source is the Jewish Association for Business Ethics. In addition to examining a wide range of issues revolving around integrity, it also offers the downloadable booklet Jewish Principles in the Workplace. [tinyurl.com/ethics16]

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks addresses the issue of corporate responsibility and places much blame on businesses that shrug off their responsibility to their workers, their customers and their community. "Judaism cannot accept the principle that markets, business, and corporations are a value-free zone" that cry, "It wasn't me," when something goes wrong.

Aside from quoting Isaiah and Amos, Rabbi Sacks tells an anecdote about a rabbi who spent a year trying to teach the Book of Joshua to an unruly class. At the end of the year, he decided to make his questions easy. "Marvin," he said, "tell me who destroyed the walls of Jericho?" "Please, sir," replied Marvin, "it wasn't me." Scandalized, he wrote a letter to Marvin's parents. "I've spent an entire year trying to teach Bible to your son, and when I asked him who destroyed the walls of Jericho, he replied, 'Please, sir, it wasn't me.'" Two days later, he received an indignant letter in return. "Dear rabbi, if our son says it wasn't him, then it wasn't him!" In despair, the rabbi went to the president of the congregation and told him the story. The president got out his cheque-book and said, "Here's a cheque for $1,000. Get the walls repaired and stop complaining!" [tinyurl.com/ethics17]

Thousands defy weather to remember murdered children

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Heavy rain and cold winds weren't enough to keep thousands of people from gathering at Earl Bales Park last week to commemorate the 1.5 million Jewish children murdered by Nazis.

The April 20 evening ceremony, called Remembering the Children – sponsored by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem – featured a candlelighting ceremony, performances by the Toronto Heschel School Children's Chorus and a keynote address by Joseph Gottdenker, a Polish-born Holocaust survivor who was a hidden child.

The ceremony, co-chaired by Louis Greenbaum and Joyce Rifkind, also included prayers and songs, the March of the Colours by the Royal Canadian Legion and the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, and a brief address by Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto.

Gissin, who began by praising the Toronto Jewish community for organizing the largest gathering for Holocaust commemoration outside of Israel, said that the UN anti-racism conference in Geneva that began the same day as the memorial service serves as a reminder of how important it is to educate people about the Shoah.

Gissin, said that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad – who gave an anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist speech on the conference's opening day, and who often promises to "wipe Israel off the map" – uses rhetoric that brings back memories of "hatred without reason against the Jews and against the State of Israel."

Gissin then turned his focus to the 1.5 million children who died during the Holocaust, and the ones who were lucky enough to be taken in by gentiles who hid them from the Nazis in their homes.

"Among the kids who survived the Holocaust… was John Sanders, who lived in the Netherlands and was saved by the Develing family," he said.

Gissin presented a Righteous Among the Nations certificate from Yad Vashem posthumously to Catharina Develing, a widowed mother of five, who took Sanders in for 2-1/2 years during the war.

Tina Knetsch-Develing, her daughter and the last surviving member of the family that took Sanders in, accepted the certificate on behalf of her late mother.

Joined by her son and nephew, Knetsch-Develing, who immigrated to Canada after the war, lit a memorial candle.

As she took to the stage, every member of the audience stood silently in her honour as she lit a candle with Sanders.

Sanders, who wanted to publicly thank the Develing family, said that "exactly 23 years ago, my first granddaughter was born, and a few months ago, our great-grandson entered this world. All of this could not have happened if Catharina Develing… had not opened her house to me."

Gottdenker, another child survivor of the Holocaust, spoke about the world he was born into in Sandomierz, Poland, in 1942.

He said his father was taken to a concentration camp before he was born, and his mother made arrangements with a Polish family, the Ziolos, to hide Gottdenker in their home.

His mother eventually decided that it was too dangerous for her to remain in their home, and she joined the Zegota, the Polish underground group, leaving Gottdenker with the Ziolos for almost three years.

"Many were forced to live under assumed identities, longingly anticipating the return of their mother and father. Some were so young when they were separated from their parents that they forgot their real names and Jewish identities," Gottdenker said.

But, he added, these children were the lucky ones. Those who couldn't find a home in which to hide from the Nazis, lived like animals in the forests or were caught and sent to death camps.

"They were often the first prey of the Nazi killing machine."

He said that after the war, children who survived the Holocaust had to begin a long and painful process of rehabilitation.

"I, too, have rebuilt my life, but I'll never forget how that life began, and how it was only by the gracious kindness of others that I survived the Shoah at all," Gottdenker said.

"Even after witnessing their own friends being murdered by Nazis for hiding Jews in their homes, [the Ziolos] continued to protect me until the end of the war."

The Ziolos have since died, but Gottdenker said he is in the process of having the family recognized by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations.

Ottawa's Durban stance praised at memorial

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — For the first time in its six-year history, the national Holocaust Remembrance Day ceremony was not held on Parliament Hill.

Because of an ongoing protest by thousands of Tamils urging Ottawa to broker a ceasefire in the civil war in Sri Lanka, organizers decided to move the event to the Canadian War Museum, which proved to be a fitting, although eerie, setting.

Sitting in a huge hall, surrounded by tanks and with a fighter plane hanging overhead, hundreds of people including Holocaust survivors and their families, as well as politicians and representatives of various embassies and churches – some of whom had arrived in the nation's capital on buses from Montreal and Toronto – assembled to pay tribute and to remember those who perished.

The commitment of the government of Canada to fight anti-Semitism and to support Israel's right to exist was affirmed by Jason Kenney, minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism.

"When speaking of the Holocaust and the history of hatred that made it possible, truly words fail us," Kenney said.

"While hatred begins in hearts, it is spread in words," he added. "We must withdraw public support from those who promote hatred or defend terror."

MC Joel Dimitry praised Canada for taking the lead in refusing to attend last week's United Nations' Durban Review Conference in Geneva. "Canada was the first country to pull out of the Durban II [anti-racism] conference, and if you saw it on television, you know they were not wrong… For taking a stand against anti-Semitism, we owe this government our great gratitude," he said.

His sentiments were echoed by Israel's ambassador to Canada, Miriam Ziv.

"Canada should be commended for its decision to pull out of this conference," she said.

Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff spoke of the six million victims of the Holocaust as individuals who must always be remembered. He also paid tribute to the Canadian military. "We also remember those who fought for freedom. Every single member of this audience is honoured, as I am, by the presence of our heroic veterans."

Gilles Duceppe, leader of the Bloc Québécois, said that "each member of the human community is responsible and has a duty to remember." He also spoke about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and said the Palestinians must have their own state.

"Even in a century with so much tragedy, nothing comes close to the Holocaust of six million Jews," said NDP leader Jack Layton. "It taught us the brutality and the evil of which humanity is capable. You wouldn't have thought it was possible."

Wreaths were laid by survivors and their families, accompanied by various politicians.

Fran Sonshine, national chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, expressed appreciation to all who attended the event, from children to politicians.

Doubling Your GIC Returns

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 8% Plus

With interest rates at their lowest level in 40 years and stock markets in the doldrums, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free returned to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield.

The following example, compares the investment of $200,000 invested in a GIC at 5% with an insured annuity, for a male aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

	GIC	Insured Annuity
Capital	200,000	200,000
Annual Income	10,000	22,393
Taxable Income	10,000	2,599
Tax (46%)	4,600	1,196
After Tax Income	5,400	21,197
Insurance Cost	NIL	11,124
Spendable Income	5,400	10,073
Pre-Tax Yield	5%	9.33%
Estate Value	200,000	200,000
Subject to Probate	YES	NO
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

Annuity Income Postponed until Jan 15, 2010

MEGILLAT HASHOAH READ

יום העצמאות מגיע מחר, ואיתי הזדמנות חד שנתית להיות ביחד עם ישראלים. ילדותחבר שוב לתרבות שלנו, יכול ישראלי לצאת מישראל, אבל אינך יכול להוציא את ישראל מעצמך.

התחושה שלנו מתחזקת, יכמי שהמנה ראיני לראשונה תאטרון תחולתי שנוצר בטוריונטו, כי גם האירוע של יום העצמאות בנוי על הטכניות שלנו.

לפי טעמדרון לא פנש-תהיה הזדמנות נפלאה לראות את נתית שיבל בהופעה. נתית עשתה הוסטריה כשהיתה הזמרת הצעירה ביותר שהופיעה או פעם בפסטיבל הזמר הזמון של שנות השבעים בשיר של הזמיה. המנוראות שירה שובל המוסיקאי נסים שובל. נתית היתה בת אריע עשרה אז. זכתה להברה לאומית כיך לילה. עם השנים פיתחה נתית הקריאר בינלאומי, וקולה המדהים עם יכולת מוסיקאלית חיבתת עולם עושים את ההאזנה לחויה בעננת.

לסיפוי של נתית יש פרק המשך-בתה תותי דרויאן, זמרת מדהימה בזכות עצמה. לראת פוה בית ספר תיכון-גם היא מופיעה בערב הישראלי של יום העצמאות. לצידן של נתית ותותי תופיע גם דפנה דקל, זמרת מהיגנת שכיוכרת לכל מי שמעורב מקהילה שלנו.

יום העצמאות הוא חגג של הביחה, כדברי המשורר אביר גלבע "פתאים קם אדם בבוקר ומגרגש שהוא עם יתחיל ללכת". אז בואו להיות ביחד.

שאט נפש

יזיד להורים ולשכחה על הקטע הבא:

ראש הממשלה אמר את הדברים הבאים בראיון לעיתונות:

"מוסלמים המעדיפים לחיות תחת חוקי השריעה, מוזמנים לעזוב את המדינה. אני בעד פיזוח ומעקב מודיעיני על מסגדים, המהווים כר פעילה נחב לתכנון פעולות טרור נגד המדינה.

נתניהו?

ליברמן?

אהוד ברק?

ממש לא!!.

אלה היו דבריו של ראש ממשלת אוסטרליה, ג'ון הווארד.

רק מה-

כשאומר את זה ראש ממשלת אוסטרליה-לא קוראים לזה גזענות, אלא רק רצון לחיות על פי החוק.

אבל שישאר בינינו.

Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah

'Canada afforded me a new life,' survivor says

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — They came from all walks of life – Holocaust survivors, educators, politicians, professionals, businesspeople, Jews, non-Jews, men, women and teenagers.

They filled Pier 21 Auditorium in Halifax to overflowing to honour the six million who died in the Holocaust. They came to listen to Toronto's Max Eisen tell his story of heartbreak and survival, many wiping tears as he talked of man's inhumanity to man.

Toronto's Max Eisen speaks in Halifax.

It was Yom Hashoah 2009.

In several Atlantic Canadian communities, large crowds fill halls and synagogues to light memorial candles, recite names of those who perished, and hear testimony from people such as Max Eisen. Two nights earlier, on April 19, he spoke to 200 people at Temple Sons of Israel in Sydney, N.S., and then brought his message to Halifax.

Elly Gotz, a retired engineer from Toronto and, like Eisen, a speaker with the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, addressed audiences in Saint John and Fredericton, N.B. Halifax resident and longtime Holocaust educator Philip Riteman, a survivor, addressed a large crowd in Moncton. Fredericton's Israel Unger, also a survivor, spoke in Charlottetown, P.E.I., while survivors, led by Ernie Mauskopf, spoke to their home community of St. John's, Nfld.

Eisen, 80, said in Halifax that he knew he was home when his ship docked in Quebec City in 1949.

"Canada afforded me a new life, a new start, a family and success in business," said the retired Toronto manufacturer. "I came alone [after being in concentration camps and on death marches for the last year of World War II]. Only two cousins survived with me."

He said Germans lived by three words concerning Jews – excommunication, expulsion and extermination.

"Just today, I read of a speech given by the Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad at a human rights conference in Switzerland. What I heard Hitler say on radio in 1938, when I was nine years old, that Jews should be exterminated from the world, was the same as I read today. What's so upsetting is that, even though people today walked out from that speech, many sat and applauded after [Ahmadinejad] finished."

He stressed that this should be a warning to everyone. "The Germans took our freedoms away. How can we live in a world today where these choices could be taken away again!"

Born in Czechoslovakia, Eisen was 15 in 1944 when he and his family were uprooted from Moldava, then in Hungary, and taken to Auschwitz-Birkenau. Existing on about 300 calories a day, a skeletal Eisen toiled in labour gangs with his father and uncle, who were the only survivors from his immediate family. They were soon subjected to medical experiments and slain.

"This was a world no one can imagine unless you lived it. Their aim was to grind us away body and soul. But I had a tremendous will to go on. I didn't want to wind up in the gas chamber."

When liberated by the American 761st Black Battalion on May 6, 1945, Eisen's extended family of 70 people was nearly decimated. He lived in an orphanage for three years and arrived in Toronto in 1949, where he married, had children (he now has great-grandchildren) and retired in 1991 to become a volunteer Holocaust educator.

"As Jews, we must continue to say, 'You can't do this to us, or anyone, in our cities, in our country, in our time.'"

GHETTO UPRISING REMEMBERED: The 66th anniversary of the start of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising was commemorated April 19 at Toronto's Winchevsky Centre. Lighting memorial candles were, from left, Barbara Blaser, Marsha Solnicki, Lisa Roy, Howard Kaplan, Solly Blaser and Sol Hermolin. Guest speaker was Bernice Eisenstein, author of the 2006 memoir I Was a Child of Holocaust Survivors. The Toronto Jewish Folk Choir also performed. [Ron Csillag photo]

We must take Ahmadinejad at his word

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The April 20 opening session of the UN-sponsored "Durban II" anti-racism conference in Geneva quickly became a farce, as Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad took the podium for an anti-Jewish and anti-Israel tirade.

While the April 20 CBC and CTV evening newscasts gave the story only brief mention, Global TV News' Mideast correspondent Lauren McNabb had a full report, describing the scene during Ahmadinejad's speech: "As a stream of European delegates walked out in defiance, and a group of journalists booed, the Iranian leader simply smiled and he kept on talking, at one point, calling Israel a country created on the 'pretext' of Jewish suffering from World War II, this on the eve of Holocaust Remembrance Day."

The following day, newspapers across Canada gave the story front-page attention, and many also commented in editorials.

In "The farce of Durban II," the National Post noted: "Canada was the very first nation – aside from Israel – to announce it would be boycotting the conference, a decision that likely influenced the decision of other nations to not attend. It is hard to remember the last time that Canada exercised leadership on the world stage in such a decisive manner."

The Globe and Mail editorial, "Destined to degenerate," also commended Canada for having been "ahead of the curve" in refusing to "lend legitimacy to an event that was destined to turn into a circus."

In its editorial "Rebuffing Iran's Hatred" (April 22), the Toronto Star took a different line. While condemning Ahmadinejad for his "vile diatribe against Israel," it argued that Canada's position would have been more effectively conveyed from Geneva.

In a news piece for the Globe and Mail ("Iranian leader's 'hateful' tirade causes chaos at UN summit," April 21), Patrick Martin quoted Israeli analyst Barry Rubin on the wider significance of Ahmadinejad's aggressive stance. Rubin remarked: "There's little doubt that [Ahmadinejad] expects his remarks to play well at home, and to stir things up [in Arab states]."

However, Rubin noted, "Egypt and most other Arab states will see right through this speech and recognize it as a ploy to claim leadership in the Arab world. With the exception of Syria, Sudan, Qatar and Yemen, Arab states oppose this guy."

Martin added: "Just this past weekend [April 18], Egyptian media accused Iran of attempting to foster an uprising inside Egypt, by placing Hezbollah agents in the country" – a development that has gone largely unreported in western media.

According to some experts, Ahmadinejad and other leaders in Tehran are convinced the Islamic Republic of Iran can reclaim Persia's glory days and become a regional superpower, which is one reason it's so determined to pursue its nuclear program against all international opposition.

Iranian leaders are also equally convinced that the West is in irreversible decline. Although overlooked in media reports, during his speech in Geneva, Ahmadinejad said, "I also want to lay emphasis on the fact that western liberalism and capitalism has reached its end."

In an important New Yorker article detailing the "Zionist" conspiracy theories that define the mentality of Ahmadinejad and those around him, Jon Lee Anderson ("Can Iran Change?" April 13) left no doubt that Iran's leaders see the world very differently from liberal westerners. For example, Mohammed Ali Ramin, who "advises" Ahmadinejad on the Holocaust (they are both deniers), told Anderson: "Israel has been created to destroy not only Muslims but the Jews themselves." Ramin also insisted that the Jews carried out the 9/11 attacks and then blamed it on the Muslims in order to "have an excuse to attack some Muslim nations."

In his Geneva talk, Ahmadinejad insisted that "the Zionists" and their allies in the Bush administration planned the military assault on Iraq.

It's clear that the Iranian president and other top officials in the Islamic Republic say these things because they believe them profoundly. The lesson is that the West should take them at their word and plan accordingly.

People often have to choose between paying bills or buying groceries

Stories bring the situation to life, he said. "Behind the numbers there are people who are trying to get through tough times."

Wolfman said that people don't understand the reality of the situation until it becomes personal. "They don't grasp the concept of how quickly things can turn around. The community is slow in coming to terms with its challenges but we cannot turn a blind eye. This is reality."

Simon Kalkstein, supervisor of JF&C's Gordon W. Wolfe branch at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, said the situation downtown hasn't changed drastically.

"The caseload is up, but not tremendously, and we are giving out more food vouchers."

He continues to see people "who are having trouble juggling. Do they buy groceries or pay their utility bills? It's 'Sophie's Choice.' Do they pay rent or hydro? All this is not new, but I am seeing a little more."

The problem, he said, is that it's not clear if the economy has hit bottom. "We're holding our own, but it's not a good time. Thank goodness for the Jewish community."

Cummings said that JF&C is particularly challenged, because hard times are befalling many clients at the same time as cutbacks are happening at the agency. "Where do we cut? If we reduce services [we would cause] the perfect storm.

"I cannot emphasize enough that not only are we keeping the same level of services, we are trying to increase them. Our mandate is to support the vulnerable and keep our families safe. We are being fiscally responsible, and we keep our budget lean."

There is no template for this situation, he said. "It is the first time in decades that so many people are affected.

"I feel passionate about telling our story. I want people to know what is going on, but I also want them to feel our optimism. There is help out there, and together we can get through this difficult time."

Visiting Israel was a transformative experience

Life Coach Corner
Judy Siblin-Librach

When you stay open to new adventures, whole new worlds become available to you. Staying open, taking chances and stepping outside the box leads to great discoveries and a panoply of life-changing experiences that you would never have otherwise. Such was our transformative experience for 15 days this past April when we went to Israel as a family for the first time.

I had never been to Israel before, and so every moment was highly charged with an incredible intensity that's hard to describe. As we landed in Tel Aviv, I held hands with our two children, both of whom were on either side of me. I wept as we landed, when I saw all of the lush greenery. There was something exquisitely poignant about this beautiful land that we've worked so hard for, and my heart felt a surge of pride on seeing it for the first time.

When we arrived in the only three-year-old, beautiful Ben-Gurion Airport, I couldn't get over how clean and bright and stunning it was. I have to stop here to say that Israel is really, really extraordinarily beautiful.

After we arrived in Tel Aviv, we had falafel on the beach while overlooking the Mediterranean Sea and watching the most gorgeous sunset I'd ever seen. Israel is breathtaking – the mountains, the lush greenery, the palm trees and the sunsets in fuchsia pinks and tangerine oranges. It is the Caribbean; Hawaii; Santorini, Greece; and Banff all rolled into one and beyond. It really takes your breath away. Add to that the sights and sounds and smells of the colourful market that you walk through on your way to the Western Wall, or Kotel as it's called.

And that is another moment that was unparallelled: my husband and son praying together at the Kotel, and then my daughter and I praying in the women's section, and together putting in all of our notes. I couldn't get over the desert juxtaposed against the flowers and the perfumed scent of pink grapefruit and mango that we experienced on our rugged jeep ride through the Golan Heights.

Tel Aviv is the perfect place to begin a trip to Israel, and we drank up the beauty of the sites and sounds of Tel Aviv and Jaffa, the Old City. Jerusalem was a wonder of great beauty, incredible depth and meaning and rich, evocative detail. Our children absorbed so much, and I was blown away by my son's deep understanding of Jewish history and the incredible poem he wrote about Israel. Our daughter, only nine, wrote copious notes in her journal, and as we were driving, she made such comments as, "Mommy, this is my homeland. When I look outside at the mountains and how beautiful it is, I have tears in my eyes."

We climbed Masada in the morning and floated in the Dead Sea in the afternoon, soaking up the beauty of Eilat, where I had to ask myself, "Why go to Florida when you can go to Israel?" It's worth saving for and going on three fewer trips elsewhere to go to Israel at least once.

We had a great tour guide named Oded Anbar (www.israeltour4u.com), who was beyond wonderful, extremely knowledgeable and very funny. He made all the dots connect and helped to make our trip a spectacular experience.

Fleeting moments will forever remain burned in my memory: the Israeli soldier we met who was very handsome and only 21 years old. Asking him what it was like and thanking him for what he does for all of us; having a seder in Modi'in with my Auntie Dodo, Uncle Jerry and the children and sitting at the table for four hours, singing all the songs and knowing all the prayers; seeing Israel through our children's eyes and loving their wonder and amazement; sharing it with my sister, Jane, by exchanging text messages every day for the whole trip; the underground bullet factory in Rehovot and understanding just how much Israelis put their lives on the line for us every day; the lovely woman I met at the kibbutz we stayed in, and when I said, "I love your country," without missing a beat, she answered, "It's your country, too."

And this is the thing. It is our country. And going there has been one of the greatest experiences of our lives. And we will be back, because Israel is in our hearts and souls forever.

Take a chance in life and you've never been. Go, I promise you'll never regret it. And if you've been, go again. Take a chance in life and do that thing you've never done and wish you had. Israel is a perfect place to begin.

Shalom.

YONA unites Jews, Muslims

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Your Outreach Network Of The Arts (YONA) founder Marcel Cohen hopes that music will help build bridges between different religious groups on university campuses.

YONA is an organization that aims to bring people of diverse religious and cultural backgrounds – particularly Jews, Muslims and Christians – together in non-partisan environments.

Cohen, a 40-year-old special education teacher at Netivot HaTorah Day School, said that it may seem as if the anti-Israel and anti-Semitic activity on university campuses is a new phenomenon, but he remembers similar activity from anti-Israel student groups when he was a University of Toronto student from 1987 to 1992.

In response to the hostility he felt as a pro-Israel Jewish student, he and a friend started a group called the Jewish Student Council.

Then Cohen and Jewish students at smaller campuses in Toronto without organized Jewish campus groups planned apolitical, bridge-building programming.

He said the positive programming left the anti-Israel groups with nothing to protest or complain about.

"That was the genius about it," Cohen said, adding that his positive programs made the anti-Israel programming look even more aggressive by comparison.

"In juxtaposition to them only saying horrible things about Israel, I didn't say anything bad against them. That was not lost on student government and even the editorial in the campus newspapers."

Once Cohen graduated from university, he decided to make aliyah. While living in Israel, he reached out to Israeli government officials to convince them of the need to develop positive campus programming.

"I approached the consulate here, but they weren't interested. I approached the Israeli government… but they were too busy with the peace process or the intifadah," he said.

"When I came back to Toronto in 2003, I kept approaching the consulate. Now, this year, when I approached them again – you can see that I'm very stubborn – they not only were open to the idea, but they said this is the most important thing."

Earlier this month, on April 6, Cohen organized a concert at York University that featured performances from Egyptian-born George Dimitri Sawa, a master of the qanun, a string instrument; Suzanne Meyers Sawa, his wife, who holds a master's degrees in musicology from U of T; Cantor Aviva Chernick, a singer of Hebrew, Judeo-Spanish, Yiddish and English songs, and Moroccan-born Cantor Aaron Bensoussan, who sang and played the guitar.

At one point during the performance, when Sawa and Bensoussan shared the stage to perform Hineh Ma Tov, members of the audience clapped along with the beat and linked hands while they danced around the stage.

He said that holding the event at York "was 100 per cent intentional. That was the place that I felt I needed to go to. It's calling for me. It's got my name all over it. It is a place that needs healing."

Cohen said he's been organizing concerts since 2004. He said he was inspired by the riot at Concordia University in 2002 that kept the current Israeli prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, from delivering a speech on campus.

Following that, when Concordia denied a request from Hillel to bring former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak to speak at the school for fear that a repeat of the Netanyahu incident would occur, he contacted Hillel and worked together to bring a cultural, rather than political, message to campus.

He said that they brought an Israeli band, Shemesh Ve Kochavim, to play Jewish and Israeli music.

Cohen said both Jews and non-Jews responded to the event.

"This concept is starting to gather a lot of steam," he said, adding that Christians and Muslims help him organize events.

Cohen said that one of the most important aspects of YONA is that the programming is free.

"I discovered that if you charge [a cover fee], you won't get anybody but those who support Israel. If you don't charge, it is accessible to everyone and the curious people will come," he said.

"Muslims and Arabs… now have a safe forum to explore Jews and Israel… Trying to out-hate them will never work."

But to be able to present the programs free of charge, Cohen relies on donations from private donors as well as help from organizations to work out the logistics.

He said when it comes to the anti-Israel and anti-Semitic atmosphere on some campuses, "a lot of people are standing around in horror and they don't know what to do. This is the rallying point… By interacting with each other in these positive places… relationships will grow from that."

His ultimate goal, Cohen said, is for non-Jews to see Israel for its diversity, and complexity.

"The delegitimization [of Israel] is all about generalizations, oversimplifications and really a lot of misinformation. Just by seeing what an Israeli looks like, at this point, just by putting a human face on an Israeli does a world of [difference]."

Jewish, non-Jewish biz students visit Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The organizers of a business-themed trip to Israel for Jewish and non-Jewish university students are thrilled that the 10-day tour was able to present a side of Israel that's seldom seen on the news.

Twenty students from McGill University's Desautels Faculty of Management and 20 students from University of Western Ontario's Ivey School of Business travelled to Israel during reading week from Feb. 19 to March 1 to take part in programming that included a meeting with Dana Azrieli, head of the Azrieli Group of Companies, as well as a visit to the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange and tours of Jerusalem, the Dead Sea and the Golan Heights.

The Canada-Israel Committee, as well as student organizers from Desautels – Zack Belzberg, Samuel Langleben and Daniel Shiner – and from Ivey – Mara Bannack, Benjamin Harris, Josh Zagdansky and Michael Katchen – helped put together the tour.

"We had a goal of showing non-Jews the business side of Israel, and the eventual goal is to have them invest in Israel when they grow up and hopefully they'll be influential people who will have a new take on Israel," said Belzberg, 21.

The trip, sponsored by the Schwartz Reisman Foundation, served as the main component of an official full-credit management course at Desautels taught by Prof. Karl Moore, called Perspectives on National Competitiveness.

Although the trip was not part of an accredited course at Ivey, Deborah Compeau, an associate professor and the director of Ivey's MBA program, presented her students with a strategic problem involving Super-Pharm, the Israeli branch of Canada's Shoppers Drug Mart. The students who prepared a case study on the topic received partial course credit.

"We studied Israel as an increasingly important player in the world market, and [Desautels] students were required to write an exam and a 12-page reflection paper based on the trip and make presentations," Belzberg said.

Although the focus of the trip was on Israel's economy, organizers also wanted to give students historical, political and cultural perspectives on the country.

"We went to the separation barrier and met with someone from Fatah, and it was interesting to see the differences in the political awareness of the McGill students and the Ivey students," Belzberg said.

The tour also visited Yad Vashem, and Belzberg said that after the visit, some students said that they had never realized before how inappropriate it is to make comparisons between Israel and Nazi Germany or South Africa under apartheid.

"We went [to Israel] right after the election, right after the Gaza war, and the day we got back to school was the first day of [Israeli] Apartheid Week. We had non-Jewish students [from the trip] who were actually angry about the existence of apartheid week when they never would have cared before," he said.

"They now understand that there are two perspectives, and they are not getting the full story."

Of the 40 participants, only 13 were Jewish. Belzberg said the students' backgrounds ranged from Saudi Arabian to French-Canadian.

"We had a very diverse group... and seeing them, the first night, dancing at the [Western] Wall – six very visibly non-Jewish people – one Indian kid, a couple of Muslim kids – wearing those paper kippahs, getting in a big circle with these Chassidim on a Friday night at the Wall – it was just the most amazing moment."

Osama Siddiqui, an Ivey student and a participant on the tour, said he was touched by the hospitality and generosity of the people they visited.

"I also found Israeli society to be very innovative, and I was inspired by young Israelis who were working to harness the power of science and technology to change the world," Siddiqui said.

Tejaswinee Jhunjhunwala, a participant from Desautels, said that before she travelled to Israel, all she knew about the Jewish state was what she saw on the news.

"Dealing with history, politics, economics and business all at one time and combining all of these to understand the national competitiveness of the country and relating it back not only to Canada, but also India, my home country, was dually beneficial in broadening my perspective," Jhunjhunwala said.

"There was a takeaway from every moment of that trip that I feel will carry with me much longer than any theory I could learn in a classroom setting."

Belzberg said that he and the organizers wanted to ensure that the participants didn't feel like they were a part of the advocacy machine.

"We showed them both sides and let them decide... When they made their presentations when they came back, their focus was on Israeli high tech and Israel as a leader. The fact that they saw Israel as an important player in the economy and global trade was an inspiring thing for us," he said.

"Most of the Israel talk on campus has been negative... The Jewish community should appreciate the fact that something is happening that is focused on tomorrow's business leaders."

MK addresses First Nations, Christian supporters of Israel

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Israel's new government won't be pressured to follow in the footsteps of the former Kadima-led coalition, an Israeli MK who is part of the new administration said here last week.

"The American government is trying to pressure Israel into agreeing to the policies of the previous Israeli government, but it will have to… understand that the Israeli people had a democratic election, and elected a different government," Robert Ilatov of the Israel Beitenu party told an April 22 audience of some 250 Christians and 50 Jews at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue.

"We expect other countries to support the decision of our democratically elected new government," Ilatov said, and he thanked Canada, "for being one of our closest friends today."

Ilatov and fellow MK Shai Hermish, of Kadima, received a warm welcome at the event from a large First Nations delegation that including Ron Evans, grand chief of Manitoba, and Tagak Curly, an MLA from Nunavut. Winnipeg Mayor Sam Katz and provincial MLA Sharon Blady also gave greetings at the event sponsored by a number of Christian groups under the banner the "Canada-Israel Friendship Tour."

The tour also made stops last week in Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa and Vancouver.

Evans said that both the nation of Israel and Canada's First Nations "have come under attack" and "we've both endured oppression," but "nevertheless we are still here."

Josh Reinstein, director of the Knesset's Christian Allies Caucus, told the crowd that the Knesset decided to form the caucus five years ago to reach out to Christian supporters of Israel.

In an interview after the event, Ilatov said that "the Annapolis process which the previous Kadima-led government agreed to was not one which had been ratified by the Israeli Knesset… We [Israel Beitenu] left the [previous Kadima-led] government because we didn't agree with Annapolis, and it's because of this that Israel went to elections and elected a different government… we now ask [U.S. President Barack] Obama to recognize that the people of Israel voted against the declaration made at Annapolis."

Ilatov, a second-term MK who lives in Netanya and chairs the Knesset's economic affairs committee, added that "even though we [Israel Beitenu] voted against the [internationally sponsored] 'road map' [peace plan], we are committed to it because it was ratified by the Israeli government… Israel has proven that when we sign a deal, we've stood by it."

"Everyone knows that if Israel left the West Bank it would become a Hamas state," Ilatov said, adding that he doesn't foresee any progress on peace talks until the Palestinians "accept a Jewish state and start to fight terror."

He said that right now he doesn't think "there is a [Palestinian] partner."

Ilatov also stressed that Israel Beitenu "is a pragmatic party" and has recognized the concept "of two states for two peoples," but it has also called for "transferring heavily Arab populated villages of pre-67 Israel," such as Um al Fahm, to a future Palestinian state in exchange for Israel retaining Jewish areas in the West Bank.

As for Iran, Ilatov said that "Israel can strike Iran militarily, [but] the question would be what would be afterward."

He added that "Iran is not just a problem for Israel, but for [others in] the Muslim world… We've seen Iran is a problem for Egypt… The fact that it has developed missiles that can reach 5,000 kilometres means it can reach Moscow, Rome, Spain… Its purpose is to take over the world with radical Islam… We have a strategic dialogue with the United States and it's clear that any kind of proposed military action would have to be considered at that level."

Yoga marathon planned

About 1,000 yoga enthusiasts are expected to take part in Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary's Yoga in Motion event, a 4-1/2-hour marathon to raise $500,000 for breast cancer research at the hospital's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute.

The inaugural event, to be held at The Hangar at Downsview Park on May 3, is designed for people at all skill levels – classes are led by yoga instructors – and will also feature inspirational speakers, live entertainment, a food emporium and vendor marketplace, silent auction and prizes.

Sandy Braz, 28, who is co-chairing the event along with Vanessa Ferrone, said that yoga can empower and energize cancer patients and survivors.

"I wanted to bring yoga and breast cancer together in an event that would create connections among participants, and encourage all women to be proactive in their breast health while raising money for leading breast cancer research," said Braz, whose mother is a breast cancer survivor.

Participants are asked to raise at least $500 each, and support tools are provided on the Yoga in Motion website, www.yogainmotion.ca. Fees are $25 per person.

Camping retailer faces fire over proposed Israel boycott

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Mountain Equipment Co-op (MEC) was in full crisis-management mode last week after reports that some of its members want it to boycott Israeli-made products and will table a motion to that end at its annual general meeting this week in Vancouver.

The co-operative has sourced seamless underwear and hydration systems for backpacks from Israel for the past two years.

"This all began two months ago when we first started getting e-mails from members of a group called BC Teachers for Peace and Global Education [PAGE] asking us to boycott Israel," said David Labistour, CEO of MEC. "It was a fairly small group and didn't seem to have much momentum, so we didn't take it seriously. Then small groups of people started showing up outside our stores in various cities and distributing pamphlets."

On April 8, members of PAGE met with representatives of the Vancouver-based MEC for an exchange that was "polite, not antagonistic," Labistour said.

"We told them why and how we do things and why we would never boycott Israel. They told us their position, which was, essentially, to boycott Israel. They also told us they would propose a resolution to do so at the next annual general meeting of MEC members on Thursday, April 30."

MEC, which calls itself "Canada's leading supplier of quality outdoor gear, clothing and camping equipment," has outlets in Victoria, Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, Quebec and Halifax.

"We just don't think [Mountain Equipment Co-op] should be doing business with Israel until it changes its behaviour," Patrik Parkes, a PAGE spokesperson told Canwest News. "Many of us are MEC members, and because MEC promotes itself as an ethical company, we believe their actions need to reflect that."

Labistour stressed that the proposed resolution is not part of an agenda driven by MEC, but rather, comes from a small minority of its three million members.

Southam estimates there are no more than 50 MEC members who have voiced support for a boycott of Israeli products, and Labistour anticipated that a boycott resolution would be defeated.

"But even if it isn't, it's an ordinary resolution, which means it's not binding," he explained. "If the resolution passes, the nine members of the board will take it under consideration."

There are usually between 120 and 180 MEC members present at the AGM, but Labistour predicted that the turnout for this week's meeting, to be held at Simon Fraser University's Segal School of Business, will be much larger.

"If people are opposed to the resolution, they should get out and vote," he said.

Since the proposed boycott surfaced in news reports last week, MEC's phones have been ringing incessantly, Labistour said. "It's become huge. Because of the sensitivity of this issue, for three days I've done nothing but answer phone calls and e-mails."

Tim Southam, public affairs manager for the company, said news reports have given the impression that MEC is calling for a boycott of Israeli products.

"That's nonsensical," he said. "We source from Israel, and we would not call for a boycott of our own products, manufactured in that country under our name. What's disconcerting to us is that some people are under the assumption that MEC is endorsing this resolution, and that's not the case."

In a letter to Labistour, Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, suggested: "Much of the anti-Israel rhetoric is based on misinformation and ignorance."

In an e-mail circulated last week, Canadian Jewish Congress encouraged Vancouverites who are members of MEC to attend the meeting and defeat any proposed motion.

"It is important to note that the Mountain Equipment Co-op is not anti-Israel or anti-Jewish," the e-mail stated.

Risky business: from lawyer to entrepreneur

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

The current economic climate has been called a lot of things, but one thing it's rarely referred to is a time of opportunity.

But that's how 28-year-old budding entrepreneur Michael Hershfield looks at it. He might not have expected the recession when he and his partner came up with the idea for a ticket reselling website more than a year ago, but with the launch of LiveStub.com just last August, he's in for the long haul.

Born and raised in Vancouver, Hershfield's initial career path was much like many of his peers. He entered law school at the University of British Columbia only a few months after getting his bachelor's degree at McGill University. After law school, he relocated to Toronto, where he began articling at a law firm.

Hershfield soon realized that law was not for him.

"I needed something that was a little more exciting and had a bit of a creative side," he says.

"I was looking for the next new opportunity, the next great risk to take."

Having grown up with a mother who is a ballerina and who runs a dance studio in her basement, entertainment seemed like the right move.

"It's in my genes," he says with a laugh.

So, what's LiveStub all about, anyway? A ticket reselling marketplace, LiveStub eliminates the middleperson – and middleperson service charges.

"Think Craigslist, but strictly for tickets," says Hershfield.

With companies such as Ticketmaster controlling the majority of the ticketing pie, consumers aren't left with much of a choice as to what they pay for tickets, since tickets are often pre-offered to other reselling companies before they even reach the primary market.

"There was a lot of funny business going on, and there's no reason why everything should be veiled," Hershfield says.

Ticketmaster has been in the news lately because of consumer complaints that the ticketing conglomerate redirects online buyers to a subsidiary it owns called TicketsNow, where tickets are sold for higher prices.

Large brokers and PDF ticket holders can sell their tickets directly to buyers through LiveStub.com. LiveStub adds a fee of up to five per cent to the seller's listed price for facilitating the transaction, with no fee to the buyer. "Compare [this] to our competitors that take 10 to 15 per cent from the buyer and 10 per cent from the seller," Hershfield says.

Hershfield's cousin, who lives in New York, introduced him to his business partner, Levi Bergovoy, a Chicago-based businessman. Bergovoy had the idea for LiveStub. It seemed like "exactly the right risk to take," Hershfield says.

"We believe consumers need to have knowledge, because the more knowledge they have, the better off they are."

Through historical data and graphs on the LiveStub.com, the consumer can learn why a particular ticket is priced the way it is.

What LiveStub promises to do is to usher some much-needed competition into the marketplace, Hershfield says.

"We want to make it easier on the fans – their tickets are like the entrance to the most intimate relationship they can have with their favourite bands."

In the few months since its launch, LiveStub has been considered one of the forerunners in the race to shift away from a Ticketmaster monopoly and as such, has grabbed the attention of the international media, including CNBC, USA Today, Associated Press and ESPN Radio.

"It's surreal that I was a law student not too long ago, and now I'm on the homepage of the Billboard website," Hershfield says.

"The only place that I got to pontificate was at the kitchen table, so [now] it's cool that people ask my opinion. But we're still a small little pisher. The awareness of how quickly the attention can go is one I'm very conscious of."

In keeping with trends in communications technology, it's not surprising that the two business partners, Hershfield and Bergovoy, didn't meet in their first year of working together.

"We were constantly in contact over Skype, Facebook and BlackBerry," Hershfield says.

When the two finally did meet, they felt like old friends and have continued as such throughout their partnership.

"I drove into Chicago for Levi's son's bris last weekend – it was as if we hadn't seen each other in months, although we talk every day," Hershfield says.

Hershfield, who was a volunteer for One Family Fund, an organization that assists victims of terror, when he was studying in Israel at Tel Aviv University, says he wants to engage as much as he can in his professional life "the things that are important to me.

"The dream is that there will be a LiveStub.co.il some day."

Michael Hershfield, pictured above as a guest on the Business News Network, hopes to provide people with an alternative to Ticketmaster.

Abbas won't recognize Israel as a Jewish state

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas dismissed on Monday calls by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to recognize Israel as a Jewish state, an issue emerging as a main obstacle to peacemaking.

"I do not accept it," Abbas said. "It is not my job to give a description of the state. Name yourself the Hebrew Socialist Republic – it is none of my business."

Netanyahu said in a statement last week it would be impossible to make progress on the diplomatic track and reach a peace agreement without Palestinian recognition of Israel as a Jewish state.

But the prime minister said he had not made such recognition a precondition for opening peace negotiations. Netanyahu has shied away from endorsing the creation of a Palestinian state, a main goal of U.S.-backed peace talks that are currently frozen.

Palestinians fear recognition of Israel as a Jewish state could help Israeli leaders resist any return of Palestinian refugees.

Those concerns were heightened five years ago after then-U.S. president George W. Bush described Israel as a Jewish state in a letter to its prime minister at the time, Ariel Sharon, and suggested Palestinian refugees be settled in a future Palestine rather than in Israel.

Netanyahu and Abbas plan to make separate visits to Washington next month for their first meetings with Barack Obama since he became president in January.

Obama's administration has said it would vigorously pursue Palestinian statehood, setting the stage for possible conflict with Netanyahu.

Netanyahu has pledged to hold talks with the Palestinians on economic, security and diplomatic issues. Palestinian leaders have rejected any notion of an "economic peace" and said talks with Israel could not resume until he committed to statehood.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas

"If you do not want the two-state solution, then what do you accept?" Abbas asked in his speech.

"We want a state on the 1967 borders, not a centimetre more, not a centimetre less," he said, referring to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, areas that Israel captured in the Six Day War of that year.

Netanyahu, who is formulating a Middle East policy plan for presentation to Obama, has said any Palestinian entity must have limited powers of sovereignty and not pose a danger to Israel's security.

Pirates thwarted by Israeli security

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — An Italian cruise ship with 1,500 people on board fended off a pirate attack far off the coast of Somalia when its Israeli private security forces exchanged fire with the bandits and drove them away, the commander said Sunday.

Ciro Pinto told Italian state radio that six men in a small white boat approached the Msc Melody and opened fire with automatic weapons Saturday night, but retreated after the Israeli security officers aboard the cruise ship returned fire.

Pinto said pistols were handed out to security staff and they opened fire on the pirates when they tried to clamber up the sides of the ship.

"It felt like we were in war," Pinto said.

"They tried to put up a ladder with hooks. They were climbing up, so we reacted. We started firing. When they saw us firing – we even sprayed them with water with the firehose – they gave up and went off," Pinto said.

The pirates followed the Melody for another 20 minutes, firing at it all the while, Pinto said.

"The passengers meanwhile were inside the cabin. There are no injuries. Only two people with scrapes," the captain said. "Someone slipped, fell. Just a few light scrapes."

Domenico Pellegrino, head of the Italian cruise line, said Msc hired the Israelis because they were the best-trained security agents, the ANSA news agency reported.

Cruise line security work is a popular job for young Israelis who have recently been discharged from mandatory army service, as it gives them a chance to save money and travel.

Civilian shipping and passenger ships have generally avoided arming crew members or hiring armed security for reasons of safety, liability and compliance with the rules of the different countries where they dock.

Saturday's exchange of fire was one of the first reported between pirates and a non-military ship. International military forces have battled pirates, with U.S. Navy snipers killing three that held an American captain hostage in one of the highest-profile incidents.

The Spanish warship SPS Marques de Ensenada was meeting up with the liner to escort it through the pirate-infested northern Gulf of Aden, the Maritime Security Centre said.

The cruise ship was headed as scheduled to the Jordanian port of Aqaba. The Melody was on a 22-day cruise from Durban, South Africa, to Genoa, Italy.

Pirates have attacked more than 100 ships off the Somali coast over the last year, reaping an estimated $1 million in ransom for each successful hijacking, analysts say.

Another Italian-owned vessel remains in the hands of pirates. The Italian-flagged tugboat Buccaneer was seized off Somalia on April 11 with 16 crew members aboard.

On Saturday, Italy's foreign ministry dispatched a special envoy, Margherita Boniver, to Somalia to try to win the release of the tug and crew. In a statement, the ministry also denied reports by relatives of the crew that an ultimatum had been issued by the pirates.

Israel's population is 7.4 million, 75.5% Jewish

By MOTTI BASSOK

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — On the eve of the 61st anniversary of its founding, the population of Israel stands at 7,411,000, up from 7,282,000 last year.

According to figures released by the Central Bureau of Statistics on Monday, the Jewish population of Israel stands at 5,593,000, or 76 per cent of the general population.

The Arab population is listed at 1,498,000, or 20 per cent of the general population.

Foreign residents of Israel and their children who are not citizens make up 4.3 per cent of the country's population.

Some 154,000 new babies were born in Israel and 12,000 people immigrated to the country over the past year.

Native Israelis, at least half of them second generation, constitute 70 per cent of the country's population, a sharp increase from 1948, in which native Israelis constituted 35 per cent of the country's population.

While in 1948 Tel Aviv, with a population of 248,000, was Israel's sole city, in modern day Israel there are 14 cities, each with over 100,000 residents, and five of them – Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Haifa, Rishon Letzion and Ashdod – have populations of more than 200,000. Jerusalem is Israel's largest city in terms of population and territory, although the Tel Aviv metropolitan area has the largest number of people in the country.

Israel Briefs

War crimes alleged

A group of lawyers in Norway has accused 10 Israeli officials, including Ehud Olmert, of war crimes in Gaza. The six lawyers filed a complaint with Norway's chief prosecutor under the country's new universal jurisdiction law, which allows lawyers to file charges against foreigners, including leaders of other countries, for crimes against humanity and war crimes anywhere in the world, according to reports. Along with Olmert, the former prime minister, ex-foreign minister Tzipi Livni, Defence Minister Ehud Barak and seven army officers were accused of responsibility for "massive terror attacks primarily directed at Gaza's population" during Israel's incursion there, Associated Press reported. The attorneys represent three Norwegians of Palestinian origin and 20 families who lost family members or property during the three-week Gaza operation.

Leonard Cohen lobbied

Pro-Palestinian professors from the U.K. last week urged Leonard Cohen to boycott Israel and cancel his plans to perform there this year. "You will perform for a public that by a very large majority had no qualms about its military forces' onslaught [in Gaza in December, and January].You will perform in a state whose propaganda services will extract every ounce of mileage from your presence. They will use it to whitewash their war crimes," wrote Haim Bresheeth, Mike Cushman, Hilary Rose and Jonathan Rosenhead, professors in the British Committee for the Universities of Palestine. In the 1973 Yom Kippur War, Leonard Cohen flew to Israel to perform before reserves and regular soldiers fighting in the Sinai desert.

Rights group raps Hamas

Hamas systematically killed and tortured its opponents, Human Rights Watch reported. The watchdog reported last week that the terror group had killed 32 opponents and maimed dozens of others during and after its recent war with Israel in Gaza. "The spate of attacks began during Israel's military operation, from Dec. 27, 2008 to Jan. 18, 2009, including the summary execution of 18 men in Gaza, most of them suspected collaborators with Israel," the report said. "It has continued in the three months since, with 14 more killings, at least four of them of people in detention." Human Rights Watch rejected Hamas' explanations that such crimes were exceptions and that some of those responsible faced charges.

Israelis want to join EU

A majority of Israelis would like to see their country join the European Union, a new survey says. The 69 per cent of Israelis who want to see Israel join the EU includes 76 per cent of Jews and 40 per cent of Arabs. In addition, 60 per cent of Israelis view the EU favourably, according to the poll conducted by the Keevon Research firm on behalf of the Israel office of the Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung organization. Some 54 per cent of Israelis also support joining NATO, as well as having NATO troops in Gaza and the West Bank in a peacekeeping capacity. Of that percentage, 62 per cent of Jewish Israelis and 24 per cent of Arab Israelis support NATO troops.

Arab village Shoah museum

A museum devoted to the Holocaust was dedicated in an Arab village. The museum opened on Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah in Na'alin, which is better known for weekly protests of the route of Israel's security fence that divides the village in two. It's located in an apartment near where an 11-year-old Palestinian boy was killed last year during a fence protest, Ynetnews reported. The museum features pictures and educational material in Arabic. "If leaders on both sides know and remember what Hitler did, maybe we'll have peace," Ibrahim Amira, a Na'alin resident and a leader of the anti-fence protests told Ynet.

The process was 'beyond the pale'

Poilievre recalled the UN's founding principles and its Universal Declaration of Human Rights as "a model for all nations to strive toward" then proceeded to lament the nature of the UN's Durban Review Conference, known as Durban II, saying the world organization's event had "degenerated into a soapbox for those who would demonize the democratic State of Israel."

Saying the UN's Durban process had "fallen so short" of being useful as a forum for discussing racism that it was now "beyond the pale," Poilievre proudly defended Canada's January 2008 decision not to attend.

"My presence here today, at the real anti-racism conference, is to say to you and the world that Canada will never stop the fight against racism."

Cotler's address included a discussion of ways to uncover the neglected voices of victims and a critique of state-sanctioned cultures of hate in many nations today. He said that leaders such as Ahmadinejad belonged "at the docket of the accused, not at the podium of the UN."

He added: "The first and enduring lesson of the Holocaust and the genocides that followed, from Srebrenica to Rwanda, is that they occurred not only because of the machinery of death, but because of the state-sanctioned incitement to hate. It is this teaching of contempt, this demonizing of the other. This is where it all begins.

"The Holocaust did not begin in the gas chambers, it began with words. These… are the chilling facts of history… the catastrophic effects of racism."

The opening session of the counter-conference was moderated by Harold Tanner of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, and featured Vatican adviser Father Patrick Desbois, who criticized the UN as "a principal of irresponsibility that engages in scapegoating on behalf of perpetrators so that they themselves are not accused of intolerance."

Cotler cautioned listeners about a UN Human Rights Council that has adopted 32 resolutions since 2006 – 26 of which singled out Israel, and none of which made any mention of human rights abuses in Iran or Sudan's Darfur region.

Later, this point was further articulated by Lévy, who asked the audience: "What happens if you are neither Israeli nor Palestinian? If you don't fall into these categories you simply don't exist. You have no voice in history. That is the scandal of Durban I and Durban II."

Contrary to the UN-sponsored main conference, the counter-conference gave voices to those such as Gibriel Hamid, president of the Darfur Peace and Development Centre, and Ester Mujawayo, who lost her husband and parents in the Rwandan genocide of 1994 and escaped to Switzerland to work as a psychologist with survivors of the massacre.

Mujawayo's address moved many in her audience to tears as she recounted her struggle to survive and rebuild a life for her three daughters.

Other speakers at the conference included former Miss Canada Nazanin Afshin Jam, an Iranian-Canadian who spoke of her family's immigration from Iran and of the heart-wrenching cases she witnesses in her work as president of the international advocacy group Stop Child Executions.

Nazanin said she is currently advocating for Delara Derabi, 17, who was convicted of a crime she says she did not commit, and who is currently on death row in Iran, which is in violation of an International Covenant prohibiting the execution of children for crimes committed under the age of 18.

Durban II's final declaration was ratified a full three days prior to the conclusion of the conference and included the item that prompted Israel and half a dozen other countries to boycott the meeting: a reaffirmation of the 2001 Durban document, which highlighted the plight of the Palestinians in a section dedicated to "victims of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and related intolerance."

Last week, the UN also revoked the credentials of a number of Jewish activists who disrupted Ahmadinejad's speech on the first day of the Durban Review Conference.

Of the 46 badges that were pulled for disruptive behaviour, the vast majority were from individuals accredited through Jewish organizations. Notably, the French Union of Jewish Students lost 21 badges.

Credentials were stripped as well from four members of the European Union of Jewish Students and one B'nai Brith member. Between them, French and European Jewish student groups had 370 members accredited, amounting to more than one-third of all the NGO activists at the conference.

Two members of an Iranian group were expelled for distributing "offensive materials" and an Israeli journalist was sent out for "screaming racist comments" from the gallery, according to UN spokesperson Rupert Colville.

But where the NGO Forum at Durban I was chaos and bedlam, activisim at Durban II was limited by the replacement of an official NGO Forum for informal NGO side sessions, and by moving the conference to the safer, more neutral and more transparent grounds of Geneva – changes that were, in part, a result of the advocacy of organizations like the American Jewish Committee, who were determined to prevent a repeat of the anarchy at Durban I.

And whereas critics of Israel in 2001 went largely unanswered or drowned out pro-Israel voices, Ahmadinejad's speech was met by denunciations in the media, including a rare rebuke by U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon. And after Ahmadinejad relinquished the podium, the next speaker, Norwegian Foreign Minister Jonas Gahr Store, called the Iranian president's speech "incitement to hatred, spreading politics of fear and promoting an indiscriminate message of intolerance."

For their part, pro-Israel protesters went on the offensive, interrupting Ahmadinejad's speech and providing context to the Israel-focused tone of the conference with their own news conferences, demonstrations and Holocaust commemorations – the conference coincided with Yom Hashoah – in Geneva and beyond.

While the singling out of Israel surprised delegates at the 2001 conference, Israel's allies worked hard in the months leading up to Geneva to ensure it did not devolve into a complete repeat of Durban I.

Israelis hospitalized with possible swine flu

JTA

JERUSALEM — A second Israeli who recently returned from a trip to Mexico has been hospitalized with symptoms of swine flu.

The man, 47, checked himself into Kfar Saba's Meir Hospital Monday, where he will remain in quarantine until tests are completed.

Doctors at Laniado Hospital in Netanya on Sunday admitted and isolated another man, 26, and are working to determine if he is suffering from the swine flu virus, which reportedly is responsible for the deaths of up to 103 people in Mexico. He was one of 25 Israeli tourists who recently returned from Mexico to be examined Sunday.

Also Sunday, Israel's Foreign Ministry offered guidelines to Israelis visiting Mexico or planning a visit there in order to reduce the risk of infection with the potentially deadly virus. No Israeli travel advisory has been issued, however.

The infection has spread to the United States, including California, Texas, Ohio, Kansas and New York, according to reports, and cases have been reported in Canada, as well as potential cases in New Zealand and Spain.

Magen David Adom announced Sunday that it would not take blood from potential donors who had visited Mexico, California or Texas in the past week.

The Israeli Embassy in Mexico canceled its annual Independence Day reception following a Mexican government request to avoid public gatherings to halt the spread of the virus.

The World Health Organization has called the virus a public health emergency of "pandemic potential."

IDF acted professionally in Gaza, internal probes find

JTA

JERUSALEM — The Israeli military operated according to international law and maintained a high level of professionalism and morals during the Gaza incursion this past winter, its own investigations found.

The findings of five probes conducted by the Israel Defence Forces were announced April 22 by IDF Deputy Chief of Staff Maj.-Gen. Dan Harel.

Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, the chief of staff, supervised the probes.

In "a very small number of incidents," intelligence or operational errors took place during the fighting, the investigations revealed.

"These unfortunate incidents were unavoidable and occur in all combat situations, in particular of the type which Hamas forced on the IDF by choosing to fight from within the civilian population," an IDF spokesperson said.

The investigations looked into claims involving incidents in which United Nations and international facilities were fired upon; shooting at medical facilities and personnel; the harming of uninvolved civilians; the use of white phosphorous; and damage to infrastructure by ground forces.

Investigators operated independently and were given access to all relevant materials and the freedom to question personnel, according to the IDF spokesperson.

A summary of each investigation will be presented to the military advocate general, who may decide independently whether additional checks must be performed or if another type of investigation should be opened.

The conclusions of the investigations and the opinion of the military advocate will be presented for review to the attorney general.

A central IDF investigation of the entire three-week Gaza operation in late December and January is set to conclude by June.

South African Jews mixed on Zuma rise and election victory

By CNAAN LIPHSHIZ

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JOHANNESBURG — While leaders of South Africa's Jewish community expressed cautious optimism regarding Jacob Zuma's rise to power last week, other community voices described his presidency as a "depressing defeat" for democracy.

The African National Congress garnered almost two-thirds of the votes, making the party's controversial yet charismatic candidate the republic's next president. Zuma won the election after overcoming a rape charge and numerous corruption charges.

"No one can make predictions," South Africa's chief Orthodox rabbi, Warren Goldstein, told Ha'aretz. "But there are encouraging signs: the financial crisis hasn't hit the country so badly and Jewish emigration is down compared to last year."

While remaining equally noncommittal, Ze'ev Krengel, chairman of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, mentioned that thanks to the "contacts between [Rabbi] Goldstein and Zuma," the Jewish community could enjoy improved accessibility to the presidency.

At Rabbi Goldstein's request, earlier this year Zuma spoke before the community and even presented the Jewish leadership with a document affirming the party's support for a two-state solution in the Middle East.

But Steve Magid, publisher of the popular Jewish affairs blog "It's Almost Supernatural," says Zuma's presidency could help one of the country's most anti-Israel bodies: South Africa's largest trade union COSATU, where Zuma is reported to have a "strong base of support."

"Zuma's style is to tell everyone what they want to hear," said Magid, who called on readers to "try and stop the ANC," on his blog, which he runs with Michael Kransdorff. They both say they believe Zuma overcame his corruption charges by illegitimate means that relied on the ANC's power.

"I was depressed to see Zuma might pass two-thirds of the vote. It's a defeat for democracy," Magid said.

Goldstein argues COSATU's rank and file "are not interested" in Israel, and that the Israel boycotts promoted by COSATU are orchestrated by a "few people with limited influence, regardless of who's in power."

The fact that the transition of power occurred smoothly attests to the resilience of democracy in the country, he said.

Another concern by supporters of Israel in South Africa is that Zuma may appoint Blade Nzimande from the Communist Party, known for making hostile statements about Israel, as foreign minister.

"We will have to wait and see," Krengel said. "We'll know more about where Zuma's heading when we see his cabinet. Until then, he's done no wrong and he's done no right."

South Africa's ambassador to Israel, Ismail Coovadia, told Ha'aretz his country and Israel would continue to enjoy "excellent relations."

"The whole world is witnessing the fact that South Africa has come a long way in fulfilling the vision to safeguarding the democratic principles for which we struggled so hard over so many decades: a non-racist, non-sexist, democratic society… Like any true democracy, national interests will take priority," he said.

Sophie Milman's latest CD finds her in a happy place

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Sophie Milman is in a happy place right now. And well she should be.

The jazz singer's second album, Make Someone Happy, won her a Juno Award last year and broke into the U.S. market. Now she's about to release a new CD, Take Love Easy, go on tour and get married in August.

"My whole career surprises me," the Russian-born Toronto singer says. "I never expected this kind of success."

Milman's 2004 debut recording was also nominated for a Juno, but she lost to Diana Krall. "If Diana's nominated, she wins by default," Milman jokes. Last year, though, Krall wasn't nominated, and Milman beat Holly Cole and Deborah Cox, among others, for vocal jazz album of the year.

Looking back, her experience at the Junos in Calgary was surreal, she says. "I flew to Calgary from Colorado. They lost my luggage and I had to go shopping for a new dress, so I was hoping that the day would at least end well," she recalls.

She says she was shocked when she won. "I was nervous and had knots in my stomach all day. I didn't even hear my name being mentioned. I saw the presenter's lips move and saw my picture on the screen – I was, 'Oh, my God!'"

What followed was a page that could have come from Bridget Jones's Diary.

"I had bought these ridiculous seven-inch heels, and I went up on stage in the most graceless way imaginable."

After her speech, Milman was supposed to go backstage for photos and press.

"I was so shocked that I went back to my table," she says, laughing. "And this woman from the Juno committee came up and said to me that I had to give the award back to her [to go backstage] and I thought, 'Back off! This is mine!'"

But that's all in the past now, as Milman gets ready to promote Take Love Easy, which is to be released in Canada on May 5.

"It's like having a baby," she says of the work that went into her latest project. "You work so hard on something from recording to mixing to the artwork. It's a long process. But I am proud and happy with the result."

Milman's song selection is always eclectic. Take Love Easy consists of 13 songs, both traditional jazz fare from Cole Porter and Duke Ellington to her own take on modern songs by Bruce Springsteen, Joni Mitchell and Paul Simon. Overall, it's a lot lighter and easier to get into than her last outing, which was a lot more melancholic. Take Love Easy sounds very sharp and her vocals seem crisp, more confident and sophisticated.

"I think this is more forward looking," she says. "It's more modern sounding, both musically and lyrically. Yet, I think it's more legitimate jazz than before. There's more improvisation – both on my part and the band."

Sophie Milman shows off her 7-inch heels.

The CD was produced by Steven MacKinnon and features appearances from top musicians Wessell (Warmdaddy) Anderson, Michael Kaeshammer and Robi Botos.

"It's funny because my sound doesn't reflect who I'm influenced by and I wanted to go for a more 'rootsy' sound on this album. But what we ended up with is definitely not roots and definitely not big-band happy. It's somewhere in between."

Although she doesn't consciously look for a theme when choosing songs, she concedes that "love" forms a huge part, conceptually, of this album. (Seven of the 13 songs have the word "love" in the title.)

But, she says, she doesn't subscribe to the Hollywood notion of love, and the songs ride the wave of emotions, high and low.

"Love is not simple. It's very complicated. There's a world of emotions in relationships." She says Love For Sale and I Concentrate on You try to reflect that. "But most of the songs are quite positive. They come from a happy place, which I'm in right now."

Among the contemporary songs that Milman has included is her special take on Bruce Springsteen's I'm On Fire.

"Bruce is incredibly manly," she says. "His songs are full of testosterone, so I wasn't sure how I could sing it as a woman. We slowed it down quite a bit."

The result works quite well, as does her take on 50 Ways to Leave Your Lover.

"That song really struck a chord with me, and I wanted to do it for a long time. I love the sarcasm and the humour in it. The problem is, the original is so incredible and perfect – how can you top that?

"We kept the verses very true to the original but gave the chorus a very Afro-Cuban feel."

On this song, Milman also experiments with scatting for the first time, a vocal improvisation style made famous by Ella Fitzgerald, on this song.

Until they sat down in the studio, they had no idea how the song would work out. But once Hungarian-born pianist Botos got his hands on it, "it all came to life," she says.

Take Love Easy should be a shoo-in for another Juno Award, even if Krall is nominated this time. Milman is performing May 13 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, before hitting the road in the United States and Japan.

You can listen to Take Love Easy at www.sophiemilman.com.

Winslet's Oscar winning role on DVD

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When I saw The Reader last year, I immediately knew that I had just seen a film of superior quality.

I was right, judging by the five Academy Awards for which the film, which was recently released on DVD, was subsequently nominated.

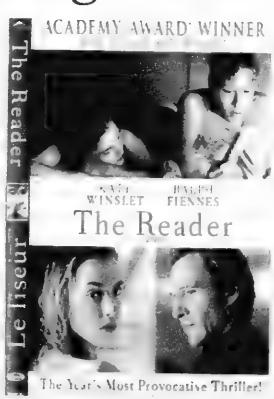
David Hare's screenplay, adapted from Bernhard Schlink's best-selling novel, was literate. Stephen Daldry's direction was flawless. The cinematography, by Chris Menges and Roger Deakins, glowed. And Kate Winslet was sizzling as a former Nazi concentration camp guard.

The Reader was also nominated for best picture of 2008, but was edged out by the low-budget but brilliant Slumdog Millionaire.

Happily, however, Winslet, an actress of uncommon talent, won the Oscar for best actress.

Which is appropriate, since she is at the centre of this exceptionally fine movie.

In The Reader, which is set in Germany from 1958 onward, Winslet is a dowdy streetcar attendant named Hanna Schmitz. When first glimpsed on screen, she is 36 years old and lives in a nondescript provincial town. One rainy morning, she meets a 15-year-old student, Michael Berg (David Kross), who feels ill. She helps him get home, and when he recovers, he seeks her out. They fall into a sexual relationship, during which Berg reads to her from great books.



She disappears, their strong bond notwithstanding, and the film flashes forward to 1966.

By now, the adult Berg (Ralph Fiennes) is a law student. On one of his classroom assignments, he observes a Nazi war crimes trial. Much to his astonishment, Schmitz is one of five defendants.

Berg has information that may save Schmitz from a long prison sentence, but will he disclose it to the judge?

In this morally complex story, Hare brings Schlink's novel to the screen with effortless ease, while Daldry handles the material deftly.

The cinematography heightens the mood, and Winslet delivers a blistering though low-key performance.

The Reader, a film of depth and empathy, examines the Holocaust from a completely different point of view.

The DVD has some deleted scenes and a making-of documentary.

Historical drama flawed but still worthwhile

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

O Jerusalem, the 2007 historical drama about the State of Israel's early days, will be released on DVD May 12, in time for Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Elie Chouraqui's film, based on the 600-page book by Larry Collins and Dominique Lapierre, was poorly received by critics during its short cinematic release. Perhaps unfairly so.

Yes, some of it is contrived. Especially the friendship between the two main fictitious American characters, Bobby Goldman, who is Jewish, and Said, an Arab Muslim. But in the film's defence, it's hard to see how the story could be told without these characters.

O Jerusalem takes place in the first year of Israel's existence, during the War of Independence.

We see Jews dancing in the street following the UN vote on the partition of Palestine, while the Arabs hunker down and plot war. We see the Arab blockade of Jerusalem, where 150,000 Jews live in the Old City, the battle for the strategic hilltop of Kastel and the fighting in the streets of the Old City.

Ian Holm, sporting a crazy lock of wild white hair, plays a determined David Ben-Gurion, and Tovah Feldshuh is a younger, chain-smoking Golda Meir, who is sent on a futile mission to make peace with the Trans-Jordanian king.

The movie takes great pains to be unbiased, almost to a fault. Arabs riot in Jerusalem, the Irgun storm an Arab village. Jew kills Arab. Arab kills Jew. Jews capture hill. Arabs capture hill. Irgun argues with Haganah, the Arab League nations fight among themselves.

I imagine the body count on both sides is probably equal.

Since the movie is presented from both points of view, there is no Bad Guy and no Good Guy, an important dramatic device. But maybe that's the point the filmmaker is making. Objectively, there is no right or wrong in this endless battle in the Middle East.

This story has been better told by Amos Gitai in Kedma and, of course, in Exodus, but all in all, this movie is worth watching.

Although history teachers will probably find fault with it as an educational tool, it does present the conflict in a simple manner, perfect perhaps for high school students.

To that end, this DVD is lacking in special features. Perhaps a documentary that put the conflict into a historical perspective, both past and present, would have been more helpful.

JERRY GRAY'S TRAVELLERS AND OTHERS TO PERFORM TRIBUTE TO PETE SEEGER

Jerry Gray and The Travellers, Ken Whiteley, Joanne Crabtree and Paul Mills celebrate the life, songs and 90th birthday of Pete Seeger with a concert on his actual birth date.

Seeger walked a tight line between being blacklisted in the 1950s, exonerated in the 1960s and venerated with awards and honours since the 1990s.

Songs written or edited by the now-legendary folksinger include Guantanamera, Turn Turn Turn, Where Have All the Flowers Gone and We Shall Overcome.

The Toronto-based Travellers became Seeger's disciples and close associates following the breakup of his band The Weavers in 1951. He made many visits to Toronto and performed many times with Gray and the original Travellers at Massey Hall and protest rallies.

Seeger is in fine health but will not attend the Toronto concert, Gray said. "He can't be there because they're planning a huge tribute concert for him at Madison Square Gardens with Bruce Springsteen and many others," he said. The local concert is at Leah Posluns Theatre, Sunday, May 3, 7:30 p.m. Tickets $40. 905-731-1805, grayg@rogers.com

Tuesdays With Morrie: The Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company's production of Tuesdays With Morrie, starring Hal Linden, opens here next week. Based on the bestselling memoir of the same name by Mitch Albom, and adapted by Albom and Jeffrey Hatcher for the stage, Tuesdays With Morrie recounts the discussions between a newspaper columnist and his former professor who is dying from Lou Gehrig's disease. Their conversations about life's most important lessons were published as a book to help pay the medical bills. The director is Ted Dykstra. $55-$92. Jewish Theatre Panel Discussion: "What makes Jewish theatre Jewish?" Playwright Emil Sher (Mourning Dove) moderates this free panel discussion featuring panellists David Eisner (Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company), playwright Hannah Moscovitch (East of Berlin) and actor-producer-playwright Julie Tepperman (The Gladstone Variations; Yichud – Seclusion). Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, Sunday, May 3, 2 p.m. 416-924-6211, ext. 606.

Media Watch: Kudos to Anne Bayefsky for the superlative interview she gave to the CBC's The Current last week regarding the United Nations' recent noxious Durban II hatefest in Geneva. When host Anna Maria Tremonti asked Bayefsky for her reaction to an over-the-top, Israel-bashing comment from author Naomi Klein, Bayefsky made a smart rebuttal and then a gracious exit before Tremonti could further attempt to undermine her eloquent defence of Israel. Bayefsky is a York University professor, a senior fellow at the Hudson Institute, and editor of the watchdog publication Eye On The UN.

Names in the News: Classic jazz fans were treated to a special program on Gene Steven's Vintages Favourites show on AM 740 last week. Stevens interviewed Toronto photographer Tom Sandler, whose late mother, Ruth Lowe (Sandler) composed I'll Never Smile Again, the wonderful tune that launched Frank Sinatra's career nearly 70 years ago. Sandler shared some rare recordings from the Big Band era, including alternate versions of I'll Never Smile Again (and Put Your Dreams Away, another of his mother's compositions) by Bing Crosby, Fats Waller and other artists. He also promoted the very good idea of putting Lowe onto Canada's Walk of Fame.

More Names in the News

• Toronto's mayor, David Miller, led a delegation that unveiled a new street-name sign, "Ed Mirvish Way" on April 15 to honour the late theatre impresario, restaurateur and bargain department-store owner. Ed Mirvish's widow, Anne Mirvish, and his son, David Mirvish, and members of the public attended the ceremony at the corner of King and Duncan streets in the entertainment district. Ed Mirvish died in 2007 at the age of 92.

• Daniel Brooks is the director and co-creator (with Rick Miller) of Hardsell, a Canadian Stage production about "the nightmare of consumerism," at the Berkeley Street Theatre until May 9. Family's saga in wartime Shanghai comes to the stage

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Seven years after Vivian Kaplan's Holocaust book Ten Green Bottles – Vienna to Shanghai – Journey of Fear and Hope was launched, it continues to resonate with readers.

Now, Te-Amim Music Theatre, a non-profit company that uses the arts for Holocaust education, is presenting a new one-act play based on the book at the Al Green Theatre in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre in downtown Toronto.

"The book has taken on a life of its own," Kaplan said from her Toronto home. "There are so many people around the world affected by it."

The poignant book is written from the point of view of Kaplan's mother, Nini Karpel, who starts by telling of her care-free life in Vienna before Adolf Hitler came to power.

After that, however, in order to survive, the family fled to Shanghai and suffered anew under the Japanese occupation of China.

Vivian Kaplan

Kaplan, who was born in Shanghai, received the Canadian Jewish Book Award in 2003 for Ten Green Bottles, and won the first prize literary award from ADEI-WIZO (Associazione Donne Ebree d'Italia, the Women's International Zionist Organization in Italy) in 2007, after the book was translated into Italian.

The author was honoured at an award ceremony in Florence's Palazzo Vecchio, where high school students read from her book.

"Later we spoke about how it affected them," Kaplan said. "That was really a highlight, but there have been so many moving experiences."

Kaplan was invited to speak at Sapienza University of Rome, and a luncheon was held in her honour hosted by Canada's ambassador. Being honoured in Italy was significant for Kaplan, because her father left Austria for Milan in 1938, and his story is told in Ten Green Bottles.

Helena Fine

Nini Karpel's journey has touched Kaplan's readers worldwide, especially those whose family share her Shanghai experience – close to 20,000 European Jewish refugees took refuge there, because it was one of the few places European Jews could go without a visa.

But it was the book's historic setting that drew singer/producer Helena Fine of Toronto's Te-Amim Music Theatre to contact Kaplan. When Fine returned with the Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir from the World Choir Games in Xiamen, China, in 2006, she read Kaplan's family saga and was inspired.

"I thought Ten Green Bottles would be a wonderful way of educating high school students. This story has a different angle because there are a lot of Chinese immigrants in Toronto, so this would be an interesting story for them and others to hear," said Fine, whose theatre uses the arts to teach about the Holocaust.

The play was adapted by its director, Mark Cassidy (The Secret of Gabi's Dresser; Kafka and Son), in collaboration with cast members Lauren Brotman (Dora Mavor Moore Award and Jessica Fraser Award), Sascha Cole (Beatrice Fox in The Great War – CBC/Gala Films), Ginette Mohr, Nathan Schwartz and Daniel Krolik.

Cassidy who workshops with actors to improvise and revise the script, also consulted with Kaplan.

"Mark gets to the inner core of the people and has taken the play beyond the book," Kaplan said. "He looks for parts that are significant to him, like how the characters interact, what they are thinking and feeling in the framework of the historical play, which will bring it to reality for the audience."

A Holocaust survivor will speak after every daytime performance for students, which begin May 14. There will be a limited number of evening performances open to the public, including a gala performance on May 23, 7:30 p.m. as a fundraiser for Te-Amim Music Theatre.

For tickets, performance dates and times visit www.te-amim.com or www.mnjcc.org or call 416-924-6211. For school showings and bookings, call 416-642-0430.

New reality show profiles real estate agents

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

People are fascinated by real estate, said a Toronto agent who appears in the second episode of a 10-episode half-hour documentary series on W Network.

Giving viewers a peek into the day-to-day lives of real estate agents, The Agents profiles two agents each week – a rookie trying to make it in the business and a pro struggling to stay there.

Leslie Dennis, 46, an agent since 1991, said people always have questions for her when they find out what she does. "If I'm at the hairdresser, the grocery store, the dentist – they all want to know if they should sell, if they should buy, how the prices are, etc."

What they do not realize, she said, is that agents are much more than "salespeople dealing in buying and selling. We have to know how to talk to people, to listen to them, and to know what they want even if they don't know themselves.

"We see everything. We're in people's drawers and in their bathrooms. We forge a relationship with our clients. We have to build trust and respect. It's hard work, but I wouldn't trade it for anything," said Dennis, a single mother of a 15-year-old and an 11-year-old.

Real estate follows life cycles, she said, "and we're there for all of them. Houses are bought or sold when clients have babies, become empty nesters, have a death in the family or are getting married. We share in these events."

On top of everything else, she said, "we have to juggle our own lives. We have to be at our kids' soccer games, pick them up from school and take them to medical appointments, even if we have an offer coming through."

To organize her life, she gets help from newer agents who have different schedules and can assist her when she has other obligations, she said.

"I have to work with other people. I'm raising kids, and I want to be a good role model. I want them to know that mothers can work hard and still be great moms."

The Agents was filmed when the economy began to turn, said Dennis, and "that shaped the story lines. Listings are taking longer, price reductions are common, and there is lots of staging so a house stands out from the others.

"Staging a house is like packaging a lipstick. Put the same colour lipstick in a sleek box and it sells faster. There is no question about it."

The show, she said, a "docusoap," gives viewers some idea of the "life behind the life. People will see that we make deals and we live our lives. We're not unique."

Dennis' episode is scheduled to air May 4 and 6. For more information, check your listings .

Poems for a fallen industry: Philip Levine's Detroit elegies

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Norman Ravvin

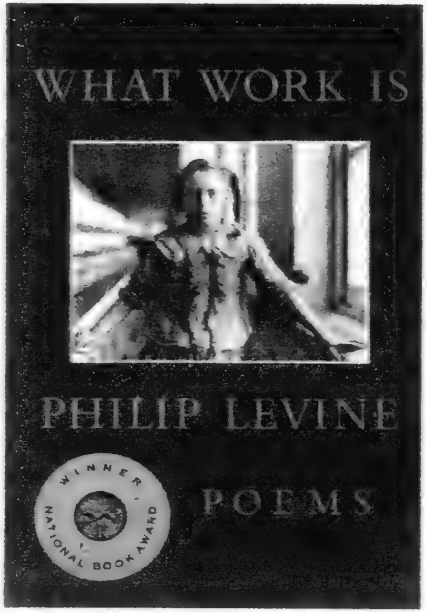
With the news filled with the imminent bankruptcies of General Motors and Chrysler, much attention is being paid to the mistakes made by the managers of these manufacturing giants; the investment strategies of American and Canadian governments to keep them afloat, and to the job losses that will result as they emerge in some pared-down form.

Not enough is said, though, about the centrality of car culture in North American life, and the way the failure of such trademark American brands reflects fundamental shifts in technology and work in auto-building centres like Detroit and Windsor.

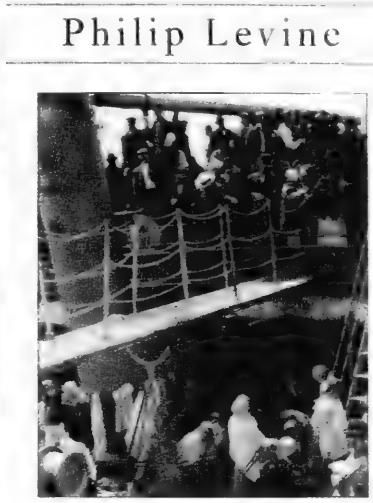
It may come as a surprise that there is a poet – Detroit-born Philip Levine – whose major works, as well as being wonderful and sad portraits of a particular time and place in postwar America, provide a primer on the history of work and daily life associated with the heyday of the American automotive industry.

The two collections that evoke these things in the greatest detail are What Work Is (Knopf), which appeared in 1991, and The Mercy (Knopf), published in 1999.

Levine writes elegies, narrative poems that tend to share a similar shape and length, aimed at evoking character, place and the era of the writer's youth in the 1940s and 1950s. Detroit, though the hub of a key American industry, is described as "our least favorite city," a place where soot and snow settle on the shoulders of men "in a long line/ waiting at Ford Highland Park. For work." It is the place that, some fifteen years later, would be "bombed and burned from the inside/ by its own citizens."



Levine's own youthful experience of shift work was dirty and brutal. It was taken up, he tells us, by the inhabitants of "a grid of crowded blocks/ of Germans, Wops, Polacks, Jews, wild Irish,/ plus some square heads from the Upper Peninsula."



On these postwar streets, Levine and his compatriots found what he calls "village life,/ exactly what our parents left in Europe." In a poem called Reinventing America, he reminds us that urban manufacturing served as a crucible within which the outsider and immigrant was remade as an American. And against the harshness of the work, the narrowness of its expectations, he remembers, too, a feeling of > joy that comes to a great artist > who's just completed a seminal work, > though the work you've completed is "serf work"

> . . . a solid week's worth of it > in the chassis assembly plant number seven.

Cars themselves appear only rarely in Levine's poems. Instead, the places where they are put together – the "night shift/ at Cadillac," the upholsterer's line "at Dodge Main" – rear up like mythic settings.

It is the looming presence of the factories on the cityscape, the baloney sandwiches eaten at lunch, the after-hours gatherings to smoke, drink and listen to Charlie Parker that draw Levine's attention. He is attentive to the lostness of it all, the particular life of a young working man or woman in mid-century Detroit.

And he is aware, too, of the peculiar quality of his obsessive return to these themes in his poetry. "How ordinary/ it all was," he admits, > the dawn breaking each morning, dusk > arriving on time just as the lights of houses > came softly on. Why can't I ever let it go?

Norman Ravvin is chair of the Concordia Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies. His books include the story collection Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish and A House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory.

Rookie MLA explores her Jewish roots

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — When newly minted Manitoba MLA Sharon Blady was invited by the Canada-Israel Committee to visit Israel for the first time in February 2008, she jumped at the opportunity to further her research into her Jewish roots.

"Going to Israel was an overwhelming experience," she says. "I've never fallen in love with a place so quickly. I think that Israel is one of the most beautiful places on the planet."

While in Israel, she did some research at Yad Vashem and learned that there were a number of Holocaust victims with her last name who were from Shistakova, the same small town in Poland where her grandfather grew up. She also met a tour guide at Masada who told her that the name Blady appeared in his family tree. His family also came from Shistakova.

"We might be cousins," Blady says. "We are keeping in touch by e-mail."

Sharon Blady

Blady, a university and college instructor who specializes in gender and aboriginal issues, was elected to the provincial legislature in June 2007, in the riding of Kirkfield Park, the west Winnipeg neighbourhood where she grew up. Her mother's side of the family is Franco-Manitoban and can trace its ancestry back to Samuel de Champlain. Her father was the son of an immigrant Polish Catholic family – or so Blady thought.

"My grandfather, Miesczyslaw – he was known as Mitch or Mike in Canada – Blady, on my father's side came to Canada in 1939 and found work on my great-grandfather's farm near Thunder Bay," she says. "He literally married the farmer's daughter. He never spoke about the old country. He never went to church with us, but we thought that was just the way he was. Grandmother was a devout Catholic."

Although Blady was raised Catholic, she says she always took issue with what she was taught. "I could never understand how you could be a devout Catholic and also be anti-Semitic. After all, Jesus was born, raised and died a Jew. The Christian faith grew out of Judaism."

Blady also recalls having Jewish friends when she was growing up. She was particularly close to one Jewish family who were like a second family to her.

While studying for her PhD at York University in Toronto in 2001 – after her grandfather had died – she began to get an inkling that she might have Jewish ancestry.

"There weren't many Bladys in the phone book," she recalls. "I kept getting calls for Abe or Benjamin Blady. I found out that they were Holocaust survivors who had operated a kosher deli in Etobicoke. I got to know them. They were also from my grandfather's home town."

Blady began doing research into her family name at the York University library. She learned that her name, which always mystified her while she was growing up, is a Polish translation of "White" or "Weiss." She found a Jewish Polish lady from the Krakow area whose maiden name was Blady who had written a book called I Remember Nothing More, about her recollections of the Holocaust.

She notes that all the Bladys she located were Jewish.

As Blady began gathering more and more family records, she began piecing things together. Her research expanded into looking for information about Polish Jews, in general.

Having ascertained that her grandfather was most likely Jewish has left Sharon Blady a little confused about her identity, she says. On the other hand, she views her new Jewish antecedents as another flavour in the pot that makes up her ethnic identity.

Last Chanukah, for the first time, she notes, she celebrated the Jewish festival of lights with her two sons, aged eight and 16. One evening, they were invited to celebrate Chanukah with JNF shaliach Erez Rotem and his family, whom she met at last year's Negev Gala. She has since become friends with the Rotems. She lit the candles every evening at home. (She also had the traditional Christmas tree.)

"We are working on this a little bit at a time," says Blady, who is divorced. "We are dealing with having Jewish ancestry more from the historical and cultural perspective right now. I'm trying to get my kids to understand that my grandfather had to flee for his life and felt that he had to choose to give up his identity to survive."

She hopes that if she can clearly establish her Jewish identity, her sons might qualify for the Birthright Israel program.

"Maybe we could plan a family trip to Israel," she says. "It would be a great experience."

Training culminates in running part of Tel Aviv Marathon

TEL AVIV — Last Friday I ran the 10-kilometre race at the Tel Aviv Marathon. The well-trod cliche that every journey begins with one small step may be so, but luckily for me it ends with a small step as well.

Over the past month and a half of intense training, I learned that the journey is far more complex than an endless series of steps – whether large or small, quick or laboured.

I've always wanted to be a long-distance runner, but somehow that didn't prevent me from letting every opportunity to fulfil that dream pass me by. There were times when I would decide on the spur of the moment to run, taking quick jaunts with the dog until both of us were nearly choking on our tongues, engrossing myself in soap operas on the gym TV in hope that the minutes would progress quicker than the calorie counter on my stair machine.

And then I met Dalit and her running club. She was able to persuade me to push my abilities to their limits (again with the cliches – apologies), to reach the place where your muscles hurt from being stretched to the breaking point, but inexplicably you still want more.

There's nothing like setting out on a dark morning and taking in the sunrise while your lungs plead desperately for air, or lacing up at dusk and watching the sun set over Yarkon Park, to smelling the chocolate wafting from Max Brenner's at the Tel Aviv Port, only to turn around and run back the entire distance you just came.

Five wonders of the world were running beside me in that group: Efrat, with whom I chatted until both of our air supplies had run out; Yishai, who distributed high-fives every time he lapped us; Hadas, with her inconceivable lust for "more"; Elad, whose effort level only began at 100 per cent, and Lilach, whose boundless energy was nearly as impressive as her consummately gentle manner.

I began to grow into the habit of waking up at 5 a.m., slamming the alarm clock in the darkness, throwing on tights and running shoes, and testing whether I could hold down even a banana at such an ungodly hour.

When I told my partner just how nice everyone in the park is early on Friday mornings, that, wonder of wonders, they even say "good morning" to strangers, he had an answer ready.

"Sure they are. They'll do anything to make themselves believe they're not the only ones who have lost their minds."

Israel avoids relegation in IIHF Division II tourney

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel barely avoided relegation to the lowest depths of the International Ice Hockey Federation's (IIHF) rankings thanks to a single win at a World Championship Division II tournament recently.

Israel opened the tournament in Novi Sad, Serbia, with a 2-1 victory over North Korea, but after that, it was all downhill. Estonia clobbered the Israelis 16-2, the host Serbs spanked them 12-1, China defeated them 5-1 and Israel even succumbed to Iceland 4-3 in the final game of the round robin event.

It's a far cry from the team's glory days in 2005 when the team was first in Division II and moved up to Division I the next year, competing against France, England and Germany.

But that team was led by the Eizenman brothers – Oren, who is now with the Milwaukee Admirals of the AHL; Alon, who played professionally in France, and Erez, another talented player.

None of them were available this year. Neither was Kazakhstan-born Max Birbraer, a former draft choice of the New Jersey Devils who has also added offensive punch to the Israelis.

Sergei Frankel was named top Israeli player in Novi Sad. The 25-year-old, who plays for Bat Yam, had four goals in five games. Defenceman Daniel Spivak was next with one goal and two assists.

Other returning Israeli included Shlomo Levy, Daniel Bochner, Ron Soreanu and Ely Oosterhuis.

I've grown up on this page

It's been five years since I first started writing the twentysomething column for this fine paper, and I'm sad to announce that this will be my last one.

Fortunately, I've been given the opportunity to continue the column as a blog on The CJN's youth site, Heebonics.blogspot.com. I'm glad about that, but I can't help feeling that this is the first phase of saying goodbye to my 20s.

I still have two years left before I hit the big 3-0, but my 20s have been so eventful that I probably will need that time just to adapt to all the changes in my life.

I can see now how blessed I was to have had such a stable, happy and positive childhood in which nothing really eventful happened, even as I skipped through my teen years.

My life, it seems, began in my 20s, as every year has turned out to be a roller-coaster marked by change and self-revelation.

In the past five years, my parents divorced, my mother remarried, I began a career, I moved out on my own and then in with my boyfriend, and I even dealt with his tragic death.

I realized that I suck at keeping the house clean, but I can cook better than I ever thought. I'm a toughie when it comes to my independence, but a big crybaby for my mommy when I'm sick. I'm a hardened war veteran when it comes to love, but a softie when it comes to those I love.

When I look back at all that has unfolded on the CJN's back page, I realize how lucky I've been to have had the opportunity to record and reflect on the most challenging times of my life. It has forced me to pause and analyze all the changes, and it has allowed me to accept what has come out of them.

I also realize how lucky I am to be able to have done it in front of strangers, who have had no problem putting me in my place whenever I came across as too spoiled or cheered me on when I needed the extra encouragement.

Two readers especially come to mind.

About four years ago, I wrote a column about depression becoming an epidemic among twentysomethings. Soon after, I received a long letter in the mail encouraging me to be positive and to find the light in all of life's mishaps.

The night I received the letter, a dear friend of mine was hospitalized for depression. I read him the letter over the phone and he was as encouraged by it as I was. I always meant to write you a thank-you note for your thoughtfulness. I hope you're reading this now.

The other reader I always think of is the man who wrote me a letter chastising me for being selfish about my boyfriend's needs when we moved in together. I had complained about having to share a closet and a bathroom. I thought I was being funny, but this gentleman made me realize that there's nothing funny about a grown woman who still stomps her feet like a little girl. (Although I have to admit, I still hate to share – sorry!)

There have been other memorable correspondents, such as the woman who promised me that some love really does last forever, the bubbies and zaides who asked me if I would meet their grandsons, and the cute boys who wrote sweet notes complimenting my writing (these are my favourite.)

What am I supposed to do now?

I must say that I'm looking forward to going hi-tech and blogging my thoughts away. Maybe one of these days I'll even figure out Twitter and tweet my column along. Hmmmm… tweety-something anyone?

I figured my life out on this back page. I've grown up on this back page. And now it's time to turn to a new page in my life.

Wish me luck.

CHOCOLATE DIPPED CHEESECAKE POPS

1 pkg. (16 oz.) plain frozen cheesecake
2 doz. wooden craft sticks
1 1/2 tablespoon size ice cream scoop
1 pkg. chocolate chips
1 tblsp vegetable shortening
Colored sprinkles, sugars or chocolate chips

LINE baking sheet with parchment paper. REMOVE cheesecake from freezer; thaw 5 min. Cut into 24 pieces. PRESS pieces of cheesecake, including crust, into ice cream scoop. Working quickly, shape into 1 1/2" balls. Press a lollipop stick into each cheesecake ball. Place on prepared baking sheet; freeze 1 hr. MICROWAVE chocolate chips and shortening 1 min.; stir. If necessary, microwave at additional 5 sec. intervals, checking and stirring just until melted. DIP frozen pops into melted chocolate; shake off excess. Immediately dust with colored sprinkles, sugars or chocolate chips. Working quickly, repeat with remaining pops. Place on lined baking sheet; freeze until ready to serve.

Allow to soften for 5-10 min before serving.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I'm still sitting here with my mouth open, not sure of what just happened. I have been dating a lovely gentleman for three months. I hadn't heard from him for a week, so I decided to call him to make sure he was alright. He told me he doesn't want to see me anymore, because throughout our relationship I did not offer to pay for any of our dates. I didn't even know how to respond to that and just said OK and goodbye.

I'm an old-fashioned girl in my early 70s and although this dating thing is fairly new to me, I don't remember ever paying for a date. My dates opened doors for me, pulled out my chair and paid for our dates. Have things really changed that much? Did I do something wrong, or should I be glad to be rid of this tightwad?

Old Fashion Girl

Dear Old Fashion Girl

Don't feel upset about losing this man. He obviously lacks communication skills, which would make it very difficult to have any kind of relationship with him.

Wouldn't it be nice to turn back time to when we were familiar and comfortable with old customs. But as the world around us changes, the rules change right along with it.

In these days of tough economic times, recessions, fixed incomes and equality between the sexes, it's not only appropriate for a woman to pay for dates, it's expected. I'm sorry to inform you that you will have to leave the comfort of the time warp you were once used to and join the new dating world of the 21st century.

What does that mean? Often it means letting go of old expectations and habits, trying new things, sharing feelings and being honest about boundaries, families, finances, health, etc. New relationships can bring complications at any age. Dating should still be loads of fun and exhilarating, but at this stage experience and wisdom will often override naivete. That's actually a good thing. You can enjoy each other's company without all the game-playing.

Should you pay for your share of dates? Absolutely. If you are short of cash, you could make dinner and invite your friend to your home for a date. This is a whole new adventure. Let your hair down, stop dwelling on what you think is proper and let yourself enjoy this new phase in your life.

Make no mistake about anti-Israel sentiment and/or anti-Semitism.

Let's not think that because Gaza is calmer and Israeli Apartheid Week is over, all is okay. Here is a response I received on my blog, to an article stating that 250 citizens were killed during Israel's incursion into Gaza, a refutation of other reports of as many as 1,000 civilians deaths.

"How ludicrous! We're supposed to trust a terrorist, the head of the IDF's Gaza co-ordination and liaison administration, Col. Moshe Levi? Then I'm sure that the six million Jews who were killed by Hitler should be revised: let's hear it from the Nazis themselves. I'm sure they'll say that only 25 per cent of the six million have been killed! What a bunch of Israeli NaZionist crap!"

People like this fellow came out of their hateful crannies in droves during the recent Gaza war. This blog comment shook me out of my sleep, yelling in my ear that it was time to wake up, as the shameful dark of night, with its ugly spirits hovering all around us, still extends into the daytime hours.

Please Google information on Durban II, the UN "human rights conference" in Geneva (April 20 to 24). The first day of the conference included an address from Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the Holocaust denier and president of Iran. It was on the eve of Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Remembrance Day). It is clear that this was meant as a slap in the face for us and those we remember.

York University's "alternative" campus newspaper, the YU Free Press, this month printed grossly anti-Semitic images. One cartoon shows menacing Israeli/S.S. troopers summarily executing innocent Palestinians in open-air graves marked "Gaza," and the second depicts a sickly looking Palestinian dressed in a pinstriped uniform, lying on the ground next to Israel's security barrier, which looks very similar to the barbed wire fence of a concentration camp.

The cartoon was promoting the idea that it is Israeli policy to perpetrate a Holocaust against the Palestinians. Anti-Semitism is not only alive, but the lub-dub of its heartbeat is audible and, well, right up the street at York University, a place of higher learning – or something.

So, as people continue to espouse views that seem to be rooted in an inexplicable anger rather than in real facts, we can't make the mistake of getting comfortable again in our blessed place in history, pretending that anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment are gone. They're not.

And therein lies the next point we need to remember. The Jewish People have many friends.

Here is another blog comment I received in response to the same article mentioned above: "I am with you, and your people."

I have also been in touch with a lovely man, Edward R. Vrscay, of the department of applied mathematics at the University of Waterloo, who cancelled a lecture he was to give at Ryerson University because Ryerson hosted Israeli Apartheid Week. In the academic world today, one which is quite anti-Israel with a strong anti-Semitic bent, Edward Vrscay did not do himself a favour by taking a pro-Israel and Jewish stand. But he did so anyway. He is a courageous individual who would likely have been a righteous gentile standing up for our people when called upon to do so. He is a friend. Thank you Edward.

Ask yourself, are you being complacent? Have you done anything this week to fight anti-Semitism or embrace a friend of the Jewish People?

Anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment are still quite busy. So are our friends in supporting us. We need to be, too.

Mountain Equipment Co-op resists call for Israel boycott

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Corresponden

VANCOUVER — The resolution by a few members of Mountain Equipment Co-op (MEC) to convince the company to stop sourcing products made in Israel was soundly defeated by a majority vote at its annual general meeting last Thursday night in Vancouver.

There were 265 members in attendance, and 70 per cent of them voted against the resolution, said Michael Elterman, the Canada-Israel Committee's Pacific region chair.

When Elterman arrived at the meeting at 4 p.m., there was a long line of MEC members waiting for admission, while people for and against the resolution circulated pamphlets stating their views.

"The venue [Simon Fraser University's Segal School of Business], was filled to capacity, and there were at least 20 irate members who could not get in," he said.

Elterman estimated that members of the Jewish community represented only 25 per cent of those in attendance, and he said he was surprised by the margin of the non-binding resolution's defeat.

"A number of regular patrons or members of the Christian community came out against the boycott," he said.

"One of MEC's upper management came out to talk to the members who had not gained admission and told them that because the vote on this resolution was non-binding,

The News in Brief

CANADA

Speakers Announced

TORONTO — Israeli Vice-Prime Minister Silvan Shalom will address Canadian Jewish Congress' 29th plenary assembly, to be held May 31 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto. Also slated to speak is Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who will receive the Saul Hayes Human Rights Award, and Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff. Other speakers will include NDP leader Jack Layton and Bloc Québécois MP Carole Freeman, Congress said.

Honey Pioneer Dies

TORONTO — Jack Grossman, founder of Billy Bee Honey, Canada's leading honey maker, died April 27 in Toronto at age 92. Grossman served in the Royal Canadian Air Force as an aerial photographer in World War II. Upon returning home, he founded Billy Bee. The family-owned firm was bought by U.S. spice giant McCormick and Co. in 2008 for $75 million (US).

Israelis Get Awards

OTTAWA — Two Israelis are among the inaugural 166 recipients of the federal government's new Vanier Canada Graduate Scholarships worth $150,000 toward study at Canadian universities. Shai Sabbah will receive $50,000 a year for three years to study life sciences and psychology at Queen's University, while Tal Avgar will get the same to study earth sciences and ecology at the University of Guelph.

WORLD

JTS Deals With Cuts

NEW YORK — The Jewish Theological Seminary says it still has a $5.5-million budget gap even after a round of cuts due to a drop in investment and fundraising revenue. In an open letter April 27, Chancellor Arnold Eisen detailed the cuts, describing them as "challenging and painful," and said more steps must be taken. Cuts already made include eliminating 10 faculty positions, suspending some employee benefits and an unspecified reduction in salary for employees earning more than $60,000.

Specter Switches

WASHINGTON — Arlen Specter, the only Jewish Republican in the U.S. Senate, is becoming a Democrat. The moderate Specter, 79, a longtime Pennsylvania lawmaker, said April 28 that he switched his affiliation and will run for re-election in 2010 in the Democratic primary. His switch would give Democrats a 60-vote, filibuster-proof majority if Al Franken eventually prevails in Minnesota's contested Senate race over Republican Norm Coleman. Specter's switch, assuming Franken wins, means Rep. Eric Cantor of Virginia would be the only Jewish Republican in the U.S. Congress.

NYU Cancels Event

NEW YORK — New York University cancelled an anti-Israel event disguised as an event about climate change. The event, slated for May 4, was titled "The Hidden History of Zionism: The Road to Gaza's Killing Fields." Organizers promoted it with flyers that some called anti-Semitic, Ynet reported. University officials confirmed the cancellation of the event, but stressed it was because the student who booked the event said it was going to be about climate change.

Charges Dropped

WELLINGTON — Charges against the Catholic priest in New Zealand who smeared blood on a memorial to former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin will be dropped. Father Gerard Burns led a Jan. 6 protest of several hundred pro-Palestinian demonstrators through the streets of Wellington, the capital of New Zealand, during the offensive against Hamas. At the monument, Burns sprinkled droplets of red paint mixed with his own blood on the plaque. Pictured wearing a black and white keffiyah at the rally, Father Burns called it a "symbolic action." He was charged with wilful damage after David Zwartz, ex-honorary Israeli consul in New Zealand, reported him.

Actress Played Maude

LOS ANGELES — Actress Bea Arthur, who won Emmy Awards for her roles in the television sitcoms Maude and The Golden Girls, died April 25 at her Los Angeles home of cancer at age 86. Arthur, born Bernice Frankel in New York, also played Yenta the matchmaker in the original Fiddler on the Roof on Broadway.

Ties With PA Set Up

CARACAS — The Palestinian Authority and Venezuela established diplomatic relations. PA Foreign Minister Riyad al-Malki met Venezuela's Nicolas Maduro on April 27 to set up bilateral relations and open an office in Caracas. Venezuela cut ties with Israel in January to protest the Gaza incursion, calling it a "massacre." Israel responded by ousting Venezuela's envoys in Israel and to the Palestinian Authority. President Hugo Chavez then said at a summit with Arab nations that he had no plans to re-establish ties with the "genocidal" state.

Prisoners Messages Found Near Auschwitz

WARSAW — A message written by Nazi prisoners and placed in a bottle was discovered by builders working near the site of the Auschwitz death camp.

The bottle was discovered April 20 hidden in a concrete wall in a school that prisoners had been forced to reinforce, according to an Auschwitz museum official.

The official said the message was written in pencil, dated Sept. 9, 1944, and signed by seven inmates from Poland and France. At least two survived the Holocaust. "They were young people who were trying to leave some trace of their existence behind them," the official said.

The note's authenticity has been verified and the museum will receive the note this month.

Meanwhile, the Czech government on April 28 voted to contribute about $100,000 toward the repair and upkeep of the former death camp. It's the second country after Germany to promise funds following a Polish plea for help.

CCRJ office to close as Reform restructures

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Toronto office of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ) will close May 31 as part of a larger recession-driven restructuring by the Union for Reform Judaism (URJ), the congregational umbrella for the Reform movement.

Rabbi Sharon Sobel

"Taking the opportunity to reshape our organization structurally is something we hoped to do in any case, but the financial situation made it an obligation," New York-based URJ vice-president Rabbi Stacy Offner told The CJN in a phone interview last week.

"We had a $5-million hit because the funds were lacking," she said.

The restructuring was based on a projected 20 per cent decline in available revenues, compared to the URJ's 2008-2009 operating budget of $25 million.

Congregations have had difficulty paying their dues, which comprise the lion's share of the URJ budget, according to a JTA report in February.

The CCRJ and other regional lay leadership councils will continue to exist, noted Rabbi Offner, who said she is "optimistic about our future structure."

There will also be a small office in Toronto to deal with specifically Canadian needs, including the issuing of tax receipts. It will be housed in the Camp George office.

The CCRJ – which has been headed for the past nine years by Rabbi Sharon Sobel – is the only Canadian regional office among 14 in North America that are being dismantled. The URJ also eliminated 60 full-time-equivalent positions in North America in January, when two of the CCRJ's five staff members had to be laid off.

The CCRJ serves 26 Reform congregations across the country and has provided services that include programs, long-range planning, and working with rabbinic search committees as well as with congregations in crisis.

The URJ is setting up "an entire new system," said Rabbi Sobel, executive director of the CCRJ and ARZA Canada (Reform's Zionist arm here), which will continue to operate independently, but without Rabbi Sobel.

In a letter to the Canadian Reform movement detailing the upcoming changes, Rabbi Sobel lauded the lay leaders

Baycrest unaffected by swine flu

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

It's business as usual at Baycrest despite concerns about a swine flu pandemic said Chingiz Amirov, the geriatric centre's director of prevention and control.

They are monitoring the situation closely, and they are in communication with their partners at Toronto Public Health and Toronto Academic Health Sciences Network, the group of teaching hospitals of which Baycrest is a member, he said.

"Our approach, and that of all GTA hospitals and healthcare agencies, is enhanced surveillance of symptoms and rigorous adherence to the precautions we use as part of our normal practice."

He said that staff is reminding residents and visitors to wash their hands and practise "respiratory etiquette. We are also increasing our signage at the entrances, which reminds people not to come in if they are sick. We're asking for people to stay home if they have any flu-like symptoms."

All this is nothing out of the usual, he said. "We have a gastroenteritis outbreak right now, but that has nothing to do with the swine flu. Outbreaks such as this one happen at every facility."

The centre has a comprehensive pandemic plan to address every level of the outbreak situation, he said.

At Terrace Gardens Retirement Residence on Bathurst Street, they are asking residents to stay in the building as much as possible, said Josie Canda, a registered practical nurse.

"They get sick very easily, and we don't want them to pick up anything."

Other than that, she said, they are not taking any out-of-the-ordinary precautions. "We always encourage people to use hand sanitizers before and after a visit, and stay away if they feel sick."

'Doing' Jewish history

From the editor's desk...

The sweet, endearing photograph on the cover of the book is a captivating, visual fractal of the substance and essence of From Couscous to Kasha: Reporting from the Field of Jewish Community Work by Seymour Epstein (Urim Publications, Jerusalem, New York, 2009).

We see a young boy, probably not more than six or seven years old, in a school, standing at the front of the classroom pointing to words and images written neatly, in large format, on the blackboard. He is smiling. He seems happy, and for the moment, at least, pleased with himself and perhaps, too, his teacher. We learn subsequently that the classroom is in an elementary school in Morocco in the 1980s.

We learn a great deal more in this thoughtful, eye-opening book about the Jews of Morocco in the 1980s – their history, traditions, communal life, hopes and disappointments.

Indeed, we also learn a great deal about the Jews of the former Soviet Union (FSU) during the turbulent, watershed days and years immediately prior to and after the fall of the Soviet empire.

Epstein takes the reader into those two vastly contrasting Jewish communities and deftly, even tenderly, shares with us observations, anecdotes and conclusions that enable us to view, occasionally to feel, and always to better understand those two different, complicated respective communities from within and not merely from the outside.

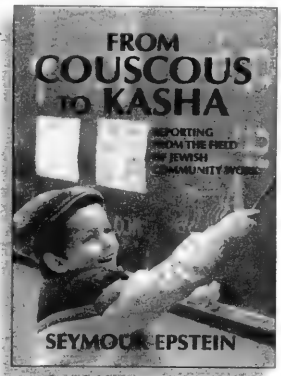
Epstein worked for the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (the Joint, as he refers to it) for 18 years. He was a pedagogic consultant for the Joint in Morocco, served as a regional director based in Paris and then worked in the former Soviet Union.

This book records some of the highlights, happy and sad but always poignant, from that profoundly important work on behalf of the Jewish people. It is part memoir, part essay. The 43 volumes of notes he kept in the field formed the well from which he drew the stories that we read.

Epstein writes as a teacher teaches, putting forward propositions and information, asking questions and then often, but not always, helping the reader find the answers. This is not surprising, for Epstein – Epi, as he is known throughout the world of his encounters – is a teacher. He is a teacher of teachers. He has spent his entire adult life in the field of education.

Until recently head of the Board of Jewish Education of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, subsequently known as Mercaz, Epstein was born into the comfortable yet changing world of Toronto Jewry after World War II.

He has always been a conductor for the current of Jewish electricity, always wanting to share with others the energy, buzz and excitement of a full, literate, engaged Jewish life. He has never been satisfied to merely sail along the shores of Jewish life. Rather, he has always preferred to sail in the heart of its seas.



"I had the sense that the great moments of 20th-century Jewish history had passed me by and that my life would be as a passive object of that history, not one of its writers," Epstein writes in the introduction.

But that sense must have quickly passed. At the age of 35, the curious, intellectual, determined educator signed up with the Joint, intent on influencing and not merely observing the course of Jewish life and history.

"My chosen career as a Jewish educator was my humble attempt to 'do' Jewish history by teaching a new generation of Jewish youth about their rich heritage of languages, literature, values and spirituality. As active as that was as a profession, it was the Joint that gave me the opportunity for proactive involvement in making new history among Diaspora Jews."

Epstein's decision to "do" Jewish history is inspirational and instructive for us all. "Doing" Jewish history, after all, is acting for the sake of others, for the sake of the larger group, for the sake of those who came before us and those who will yet come after us.

He makes this point elegantly in recounting a compelling story about some youngsters from the former Czechoslovakia and their discovery of Jewish culture at a summer camp.

"I realized that all the artificial national borders that separate Moroccan Jews from Canadian ones, Russian Jews from Israelis, French Jews from Azerbaijanis, or American Jews from Hungarian ones have almost no effect on us as a people. While our various environments have certainly given us different cultural traits, the connective tissue that links us to one another as a unique people is a far greater force than we ever imagined. As the world continues to shrink through communications technology, this unity becomes ever more powerful."

We – the Jews of Morocco and the FSU, the parents and grandparents of children who have learned and studied in various Jewish educational systems, the readers of this book and those of us who have absorbed his key, central message of the overriding, pre-eminent importance of education in the eternal continuum of the Jewish people – are the beneficiaries of Epstein's decision to "do" Jewish history.

The book will be launched in Toronto on May 10 at Israel's Judaica on Eglinton Avenue at 7:30 p.m. –MBD

In 1957, Barry and Philomena Lowes pursued their dream and founded Camp Timberlane, a residential summer camp located on a private lake in Haliburton Ontario. Their vision was to create a camping experience that would build confidence, spirit and leadership. They strived to provide a nurturing environment that would recognize a person's uniqueness and where values would be learned that would benefit them over a lifetime. The tradition continues today and is being carried on for future generations by the present Director and owner Corey Mandell.

After 52 years, Barry and Phil are committed more than ever to their life pursuit of making camping available to the new generations of children. To make this possible, they have created "Share the Magic"; an endowment with the sole objective of introducing new campers to the Timberlane experience.

* Limited number of grants now available for eligible children ages 7-15

CAMPER ELIGIBILITY:

- Must be a first time camper (never before attended a residential summer camp)
- Must be between the ages of 7 to 15
- Currently residing in Ontario

No one-sided bargains

The month of May will possibly be a diplomatic watershed in the search for a solution to the conflict between the Israelis and the Palestinians. Israeli President Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas are scheduled to travel to Washington to meet with U.S. President Barack Obama.

Abbas has wasted no time in softening up the diplomatic terrain in advance of his May 28 visit with the American leader. He met Sunday with King Abdullah of Jordan and has also announced a pre-Washington meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Whenever a microphone appears near him, he issues pronouncements on the peace process and the usual list of his peace process diktats to the Israeli government. He does so to maintain his image as a stalwart protector of Palestinian rights in light of the fact that his rivals for power, Hamas, control Gaza and most likely, the allegiance of many Palestinians in the West Bank, too. Thus, being known as a fair-minded negotiator of a permanent, two-sided bargain with the Jewish state is not part of the image he assiduously cultivates.

Abbas constantly carps that Middle East peace talks hinge on Israel's support for a two-state solution. At his meeting with King Abdullah, he loudly reiterated, "Our conditions and vision are part of the two-state solution, which also involves halting settlement building and the policy of house demolitions."

He was emphatic in stating that a prior commitment from the Israeli government that there will be two states is a precondition for talks with Israel. It must have come, therefore, as somewhat of a surprise to him when Israel's deputy foreign minister, Daniel Ayalon, the same day, told Bloomberg News that the "government of Israel, because of our democratic tradition and because of the continuity principle, is going to abide by all previous commitments the former government took, including the acceptance of the 'road map' to peace, which will lead to a two-state solution." Ayalon's statement was unambiguous and quite definitive. Israel is bound by its earlier agreements, which, as we know, envision an end result of two states coexisting side by side.

Ayalon was merely restating the commitment last month by Netanyahu said that he will co-operate with Abbas for the sake of attaining peace.

Let, therefore, a sound, reasonable plan for good faith negotiations emerge from the meetings later this month among the various leaders in Washington. But that plan must also include an unambiguous, definitive statement by Abbas that one of the two states will be the Jewish State of Israel. This will require some equally unambiguous, definitive declarations to that same effect by Obama, for Abbas and his colleagues and, of course, his rivals for leadership in Hamas, have already told the world that they will never agree to the existence of a Jewish state alongside their Palestinian one.

Two states must mean one Palestinian Arab, the other Israeli Jewish. No Israeli government will agree to a one-sided bargain. Nor should they. Nor should the United States. Nor should the world.

25 years ago in The CJN

At the United Nations, 21 members of the Arab League blasted Costa Rica and El Salvador for moving their embassies from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak threatened to break off ties with any country – even the United States – that did so. U.S. evangelical leaders urged the United States to move its embassy as well.

Yom Ha'atzmaut greetings from the PM

I am deeply honoured to extend my warmest greetings to all Canadians celebrating Yom Ha'atzmaut, marking the 61st anniversary of Israel's independence.

The creation of the State of Israel is a testament to the triumph of faith and perseverance over adversity. Israel is an enduring symbol for the world and a source of great inspiration. The resilience and determination that built this formidable, enterprising and democratic nation continues to hearten Jewish communities around the globe.

This proud celebration affords us the opportunity to reflect on the events that have shaped Israel's history, as well as the shared history between our two great nations. We count ourselves among Israel's closest partners. Since its founding in 1948, Canada has supported Israel and its right to live in peace and security with its neighbours. We value this relationship and look forward to continued friendship and collaboration.

On behalf of the Government of Canada, please accept my best wishes for a memorable celebration and a prosperous and peaceful year ahead.

Stephen Harper
Prime Minister of Canada

Yom Ha'atzmaut greetings from Ignatieff

Today, on Yom Ha'atzmaut, we celebrate the founding of the Jewish homeland – the 1948 Declaration of Independence of the State of Israel.

We also celebrate the rich and vibrant culture of the Jewish people, in Israel and around the world, and the immense contributions Jewish Canadians have made to our society.

Since a Liberal government recognized the State of Israel in 1948, our party has been a firm supporter of Israel, its freedom and security. On this anniversary, we reaffirm our belief in Israel's right to exist, and we restate our condemnation of the terror and violence that have threatened Israel for more than six decades. We look forward to the day that a free and secure Israel coexists in peace with a free and secure Palestinian state.

On behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada and our parliamentary caucus, I extend my heartfelt greetings to all those celebrating the 61st anniversary of the founding of the State of Israel. Yom Ha'atzmaut Samayach!

Michael Ignatieff
Leader of the Opposition

Lieberman will stand up to pressure

Describing Avigdor Lieberman as both a "right-wing nut" and a "religious fanatic" is false and misleading ("Lieberman is dangerous," CJN, April 17). Lieberman's Yisrael Beitenu party is the only party in the coalition, along with Labor, that supports a Palestinian state in areas of the West Bank and Gaza. A secular Jew, Lieberman advocates an easing of the religious domination of both marriage and conversion laws.

Referring to him as a xenophobe whose plan would destroy Israel is a claim easily refuted. Yisrael Beitenu is a diverse political party that does not hate Arabs – it simply deems it necessary to ensure a Jewish majority in Israel and protect it from her inner enemies. The proposed citizenship law would not force individuals to unequivocally support the state – it is simply a statement pledging allegiance to a Jewish state.

Israel is currently in a tough position, with the world pressuring for a Palestinian state without making the abolishing of terror a prerequisite, and the Israel people have chosen leaders who will courageously stand up to this pressure. Israel is a Jewish state and steps must be taken to ensure this. Only Lieberman seems to recognize that fact.

Anti-Semitism at pop music concert

My parents and I recently attended a concert by the British artist Adele at Massey Hall in Toronto. Between songs, Adele told the audience about an encounter with a pawnshop owner in a downtown store and characterized him as the "rudest person ever." Her description was very charming. During the performance, she made a mistake in one of her songs and then blamed it on the fact that she had been distracted by thoughts of that pawnshop owner. Then she added, "But don't worry, he wasn't Canadian, he was Jewish."

The comment evoked laughter. My father booed, got up and left immediately. After two more songs, my mother and I felt too uncomfortable to enjoy the concert and left as well. I was shocked by the racist nature of the comment and by the reaction from the audience. The comment was accepted and, indeed, embraced.

There is still a threat of anti-Semitism in Canada, and despite the efforts of human rights and the pride we feel in maintaining a diverse country, racism still takes place and, more disturbingly, it is accepted. One can suggest that Adele's comment was merely intended as a joke, that she is simply a silly 20-year-old displaying her ignorance. But, that does not absolve her of the responsibility for what she said. Casual racism desensitizes and provides a breeding ground for more serious offences.

Get ready for duelling prayerbooks

By RABBI MARTIN LOCKSHIN

Twenty-five years have passed since the beginning of the most surprising Jewish publication success of the 20th century: the ArtScroll takeover.

ArtScroll is the name used by Mesorah Publications, based in Brooklyn, N.Y., for its line of books that present traditional Hebrew texts in readable English translation. Perhaps the best known ArtScroll product is its prayer book, first published in 1984. It's difficult to find a Canadian or American Orthodox synagogue these days that doesn't use the ArtScroll siddur, except perhaps in the most right-wing circles, where prayer books with any English may be dismissed with disdain. But ArtScroll has managed, with some success, to reach that market, too, with a prayer book that looks like its Hebrew-English version, but has only Hebrew.

The reason that the success of ArtScroll is so surprising is that the largest and most established Orthodox synagogues in Canada and the United States like to think of themselves as "modern Orthodox," yet the values reflected in the notes of the prayer book that they use are unabashedly haredi (sometimes termed "ultra-Orthodox," or "fervently Orthodox"). Modern Orthodox values are assiduously avoided by ArtScroll, as this article will show.

ArtScroll has succeeded for a number of reasons. Its publications are user-friendly and esthetically pleasing. Its marketing strategy has been brilliant, and some say very aggressive. But perhaps the most important factor is that the competition wasn't stiff. While I always liked the old Birnbaum prayer book, most Jews in the 1980s and subsequent decades weren't interested in an English translation that used archaic forms such as "thee" and "thine." Before ArtScroll, no one had produced a useful, complete and esthetic Orthodox prayer book with notes and translations in modern English.

But now, for the first time, ArtScroll will be subject to stiff competition in the prayer book market. A new prayer book is scheduled to be released this month by Koren Publishers in Jerusalem. Called the Yehudah Bilingual Edition of the Koren Siddur, it features an introduction, translation and commentary by Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, chief rabbi of the United Kingdom. (Henceforth I will refer to this edition as KorenSacks).

For a number of decades, Koren has published what is generally seen as a very accurate, readable and esthetically pleasing Hebrew text of the Hebrew Bible. More recently, it published an excellent all-Hebrew prayer book. Now Koren has teamed up with one of the most thoughtful contemporary modern Orthodox scholars, Rabbi Sacks, to produce a visually attractive and well-organized prayer book whose beauty is not just external. The 33-page introduction by Rabbi Sacks, "Understanding Jewish Prayer," is the most moving explanation of what it means to pray as a Jew that I have read in any language.

The difference between ArtScroll and KorenSacks can be divided into a number of categories:

Language

The ArtScroll English translations are often puzzling, and the English usage is inelegant. Compare ArtScroll's rendering of the first line of the Ana Bekhoach prayer, "We beg You! With the strength of Your right hand, untie the bundled sins," with KorenSacks' "Please, by the power of Your great hand, set the captive nation free." God's name is consistently "translated" in ArtScroll as "Hashem," the traditional Hebrew euphemism that allows an observant Jew to refer to the deity without pronouncing His name unnecessarily. The resulting text – where God's name does appear in the Hebrew prayers, but not in their English translations – accomplishes no clear religious or didactic goal, except for making the translation sound "frum" (pious).

The majestic poetry of Adon Olam is captured much better in KorenSacks' English rendering, "He is my God; my redeemer lives./He is the Rock on whom I rely-/My banner and my safe retreat,/my cup, my portion when I cry," than in ArtScroll's "He is my God, my living Redeemer,/Rock of my pain in time of distress./He is my banner, a refuge for me,/the portion in my cup on the day I call." Those who appreciate the finer points of Hebrew grammar (e.g. the difference between kamatz katan and kamatz gadol) will also find the Hebrew text of the prayers more accurately and more helpfully presented in KorenSacks than in ArtScroll.

Authorities cited

ArtScroll has a very narrow list of "kosher" authorities to quote in its notes. Even the insights of renowned modern Orthodox scholars such as Nechama Leibowitz aren't included. Rabbi Joseph Soloveichik is also excluded all or most of the time. KorenSacks takes a very different approach, citing many modern Orthodox scholars, but also others, from the most haredi to the most modern. The brilliant insights into prayer of the non-Orthodox Jewish philosopher, Franz Rosenzweig, play a significant role in Rabbi Sacks's introduction. Other writers cited include the author Leo Tolstoy, the scientist Benoit Mandelbrot, and the atheist philosopher Sir Bernard Williams, who Sacks tells us is "described as the most brilliant mind in Britain." This prayer book subscribes to the idea that wisdom is found in many sources, not just in the writings of Orthodox rabbis.

Zionism

The State of Israel is almost totally absent from ArtScroll's siddur. (As a sop to the synagogues that do see religious significance in the modern State of Israel, ArtScroll has published a variant of its product, the "Rabbinical Council of America prayer book" in which two extra prayers may be found – one for the State of Israel and another for Israeli soldiers.)

In KorenSacks, the State of Israel plays a significant and central role. Prayers for Israel's Independence Day, for the Memorial Day for Israel's fallen soldiers and for Jerusalem Day are included. On the assumption that English-speaking worshippers often travel to Israel, instructions about what prayers are to be said in Israel are found in KorenSacks. KorenSacks even tells us what blessing to recite when one sees the head of state of the State of Israel. ArtScroll tells us what blessing to say when one sees a gentile monarch or head of state, but says nothing about the Israeli head of state.

Women

KorenSacks shows a laudable sensitivity to the fact that half of all Jews are women. In the very first prayer in the book, Modeh ani, KorenSacks acknowledges that, following the rules of Hebrew grammar, a woman says Modah ani. ArtScroll doesn't. But the changes are more significant than just grammatical sensitivity. KorenSacks includes moving prayers for the birth of a daughter and prayers to be recited by a woman who has returned to synagogue after giving birth. Instructions about prayers in KorenSacks are much more inclusive than in ArtScroll. KorenSacks writes that three woman may constitute a quorum for zimmun, the prayer that invites those who have dined to say grace. ArtScroll doesn't.

World view

Hundreds of examples may be found of the differences in values between the two commentaries on the prayer book, but for the purposes of this article one will have to suffice: the way that ArtScroll and KorenSacks relate to the disturbing line in the grace after meals, "I was a youth and have also aged, and I have not seen a righteous man forsaken, with his children begging for bread" (ArtScroll translation). The line is problematic, since it seems to contradict our own experiences.

The ArtScroll commentary suggests that the person reciting grace should think, "I have never seen a righteous man consider himself forsaken, even if his children must beg for food," since he will understand that his children's suffering must be part of God's plan.

KorenSacks turns the line in a totally new direction. Based on an insight from Rabbi Soloveichik, KorenSacks argues that the prayer should be understood as meaning, "I have never watched a righteous man forsaken or his children begging for bread." The notes explain that the line "is a warning against being a mere bystander while other people suffer. It thus brings the Grace to a symmetrical close: It began by speaking of God's goodness in feeding the hungry and ends with an injunction for us to do likewise."

Both ArtScroll and KorenSacks try to inspire. ArtScroll attempts to inspire to a docile, passive faith, KorenSacks to an activist agenda. "The religions of the ancient world," KorenSacks teaches us, "were deeply conservative, designed to vindicate and perpetuate hierarchies of power. Judaism, believing that human dignity was the prerogative of everyone, was an ongoing protest against such inequalities." The ultimate purpose of praying, according to Rabbi Sacks, is that we leave synagogue "seeing ourselves and the universe differently, freshly conscious that the world is God's work, the Torah God's word, our fellow believers God's children, and our fellow human beings God's image."

Amen.

It will be interesting to see in the next few months how the Orthodox synagogues of Canada and the United States choose between the values of ArtScroll and of KorenSacks. Stay tuned.

Choosing life over death

Two dear friends recently died, one in New York and one in Montreal. Both had serious illnesses for more than 20 years, yet their deaths came as a shock. How is it possible that they're no longer here on earth? Even though their lives were not a part of my everyday life, they were a strong presence. Both played formative roles in my own development, impressing me with their own brand of vitality and character.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

I'm grateful that I have such strong memories and don't want to lose that sense of intimacy. How can they not be here when those memories are so vibrant? I appreciate that for some, that sense of remembrance signifies some kind of immortality or of lingering existence of one's loved ones. But in truth, while we hold on to those memories, we no longer can make memories together. It's not easy to find comfort for that loss.

Facing death is difficult for all of us. It's so final, so absolute and so universal. In some ways, all our lives can be viewed from the perspective of death: we are born as an organism on its way toward death. Our body grows, but that growth must end in death. There's no other end possible. Creation ultimately leads to death.

This is a very bleak view of life that most cannot maintain. It offers us no solace and no constructive mode of living. I don't feel my friends' lives were so desolate. They were challenged by life, but not destroyed by it. On the contrary, I'm sad because their lives were so full of love and living. There was so much goodness, friends and family. Death came too soon.

We humans know there is death. We even accept it. It just often comes too soon. We don't turn toward death eagerly, because we're open to life. For the brief moments we do have on this earth, we're dedicated to the creative processes of living – to friends and family, to love and giving.

Our biological existence may move from birth to death, but our moral and existential being acts within life. As commanded in the Bible, we as humans choose life. That should be our focus and our outlook for as long as we can live it.

I write this column at the bedside of my new granddaughter. Surrounded by life and death, let's choose life!

Boycotters take aim at another target

Years ago, when I was associate director of Canadian Jewish Congress' Pacific region, we faced threats from the widespread and well-co-ordinated Arab boycott of Israel. That country was just the primary target – don't buy Israeli products – but Arab countries extended threats of boycott to Canadian companies that did business with Israel, as well as to clients of firms who did business with Israel. Sadly, at least one major Canadian institution went along.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

You would think that this undemocratic, not to say nefarious, way of opposing Israel's right to exist within the family of nations would be a thing of the past, since clearly it has had little impact on the good things that Israel provides and it is manifestly against Canadian mores – if not constituting illegal pressure on Canadian companies.

It seems that, like the monsters of science fiction, the idea of bringing Israel to its knees via a boycott will not die.

Mountain Equipment Co-op (MEC) is a company that sells outdoor gear of all types and classes. To belong, you simply pay a one-time $5 membership fee and shop thereafter at your leisure. We have purchased many things there for our admittedly wimpy safaris to places such as Haida Gwaii, Costa Rica and Turkey. But we're hardly hard-core outdoors people.

We even purchased a gift certificate as a wedding present for a young Jewish couple. Like many Jewish Vancouverites, we are patrons.

So it came as a shock to get an e-mail informing us that a group calling itself B.C. Teachers for Peace and Global Education – don't you love the titles they invent – was planning to present a motion at the April 30 MEC annual general meeting calling on the company to stop selling products from Israel. MEC sources two products from Israeli companies: seamless underwear and a hydration system for hikers and bikers.

Clearly these are weapons of mass destruction.

The teacher group's spokesperson, Patrik Parkes, was quoted in the Vancouver Sun as saying, "We just don't think MEC should be doing business with Israel until it changes its behaviour." This would seem to be the same kind of "we are putting you on notice of punishment" as "Floggings will continue until morale improves."

The resolution reads, in part, "Whereas Israel is currently defying more than 30 UN Security Council resolutions pertaining to its illegal occupation of Palestinian territory and is in flagrant violation of international humanitarian law codified under the Geneva Conventions, as confirmed by the International Court of Justice in 2004…" It goes on to quote that firm defender of democracy in Zimbabwe, retired Archbishop Desmond Tutu, who condemns Israel's "system of discrimination against the Palestinians" which, he says, "reminded me so much of what happened to us black people in South Africa."

Others quoted are South African anti-apartheid activist and former African National Congress minister Ronnie Kasrils, former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, and Arun Gandhi, grandson of the famous Indian leader.

What can one say? Certainly many Jewish members of the co-op were expected be at the meeting, but if past is prologue, one could only hope that MEC was ready to check memberships and hold the lid on what promised to be a very nasty evening.

Self-described peace-loving but Jew-baiting teachers have tried before to disrupt meetings of the B.C. Teachers Federation with similar hate-filled resolutions condemning Israel.

Never once have they offered a condemnation of, say, rocket attacks on civilian targets, the sexual mutilation of Muslim women in many Muslim countries (one article in the New York Times put the level of female genital mutilation in Indonesia at 95 per cent) or honour killings in many parts of the Muslim world.

No, the big and only thing holding back universal peace and education is Israel.

Even, God forbid, if the resolution garners a majority of members' votes, the MEC board has notified those of us who wrote them letters of protest that the board is the final arbiter of any decision to remove products from the company's shelves.

That decision will be reported here if and when it has been made.

Comparing Demjanjuk to Jesus is obscene

John Demjanjuk, who is about be deported to Germany to stand trial for his role in the murder of 29,000 Jews at the Sobibor death camp, is a Nazi war criminal. He may or may not have been the notorious "Ivan the Terrible" of Treblinka, but there is no question that he was Ivan the Not-so-Good of the Nazi training camp Trawniki, that he went on from there to be Ivan the Very Bad of Majdanek, Sobibor and Flossenburg, and that he lied on his visa application when he sought admission to the United States.

Menachem Rosensaft in New York

Most Americans don't consider Demjanjuk to be a praiseworthy or sympathetic figure – except, of course, for Patrick Buchanan. The MSNBC political commentator likens Demjanjuk to none other than Jesus.

I'm not kidding. In his syndicated column of April 17, Buchanan not only called Demjanjuk an "American Dreyfus" and "the sacrificial lamb whose blood washes away the stain of Germany's sins," but he wrote that the "spirit" behind the U.S. Justice Department's efforts to bring Demjanjuk to justice is "the same satanic brew of hate and revenge that drove another innocent Man up Calvary that first Good Friday 2,000 years ago."

Some innocent man. Among the findings of facts set forth by the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Ohio in February 2002 are that "the primary purpose of Trawniki Training Camp was to train men to assist the Nazi government of Germany in implementing its racially motivated policies, including and in particular 'Operation Reinhard'"; that "'Operation Reinhard' was the Nazi program to dispossess, exploit, and murder Jews in Poland"; that "Upon his arrival at Trawniki Training Camp, [Demjanjuk] entered service in the Guard Forces of the SS and Police Leader in Lublin District"; that "by January 18, 1943, while a member of the Guard Forces of the SS and Police Leader in Lublin District, [Demjanjuk] was serving as an armed guard at the concentration camp located near Lublin, commonly known as the Majdanek Concentration Camp"; that "[Demjanjuk] began serving at the Sobibor extermination camp no later than March 27, 1943"; that "In serving at Sobibor, [Demjanjuk] contributed to the process by which thousands of Jews were murdered by asphyxiation with carbon monoxide"; that "On or about October 1, 1943, [Demjanjuk] was transferred from Trawniki to Flossenburg Concentration Camp, where he became a member of the SS Death's Head Battalion Flossenbürg"; and that "[Demjanjuk] misrepresented and concealed his wartime residences and activities, which constituted misrepresentations and concealments of his wartime employment and residences for the purpose of gaining admission into the United States."

None of this matters to Buchanan, whose longtime public support for a succession of Nazi war criminals, from Demjanjuk to Karl Linnas to Arthur Rudolph, is a constitutionally protected perversion.

Buchanan has never bothered to hide his offensive views on Israel and Jews. After the 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, Buchanan said on national television that "there are only two groups that are beating the drums right now for war in the Middle East, and that is the Israeli defence ministry and its amen corner in the United States." He has referred to Capitol Hill as "Israeli-occupied territory," and he considers the State of Israel to be "a strategic albatross draped around the neck of the United States."

In a September 1993 speech to the Christian Coalition, Buchanan said, "Our culture is superior because our religion is Christianity, and that is the truth that makes men free." After John Cardinal O'Connor had deplored Roman Catholic anti-Semitism, Buchanan declared, "If U.S. Jewry takes the clucking appeasement of the Catholic cardinalate as indicative of our submission, it is mistaken. When Cardinal O'Connor of New York seeks to soothe the always-irate Elie Wiesel by reassuring him 'there are many Catholics who are not anti-Semitic'… he speaks for himself. Be not afraid, Your Eminence; just step aside, there are bishops and priests ready to assume the role of defender of the faith."

Buchanan's colleagues at MSNBC have consistently tolerated and overlooked his worldview. Perhaps Buchanan's obscene comparison of Demjanjuk to Jesus will now cause them to reconsider. At the very least, MSNBC executives should explain how they justify Buchanan's continued appearances on their programs. (JTA)

The Kirshner File

The mother of all kibbutzim

Degania, a kibbutz facing the Sea of Galilee, was the first collective settlement founded in what is now Israel and what was then Palestine, an underdeveloped backwater of the Ottoman Empire. A century ago this year, 10 men and two women, all hailing from Russia and transfixed by the Zionist dream of resurrecting a Jewish homeland after some 2,000 years of Jewish dispersion, set down roots on a parcel of land, purchased by the Jewish National Fund from a Persian landowner in Beirut, near the Arab village of Umm Juni.

Sheldon Kirshner in Israel

These young Jewish pioneers, members of the Second Aliyah, had been day labourers in such newly formed Jewish towns as Rishon Lezion, Rehovot and Gedera. Fired up by Zionism, they came to Palestine to return to the land and cultivate its soil in a concerted effort to change the socio-economic structure of Jewish society. Convinced that Jews had to move away from traditional eastern European pursuits – petty retailing, inn-keeping, pawn-brokering and the like – they believed that Jews could be "redeemed" by toiling the fields of Palestine.

But when they arrived in the Jewish colonies, which European benefactors such as Baron Edmond James de Rothschild had funded and supported, they discovered, to their dismay, that a Jewish "culture of labour" had been deformed by the vicissitudes of circumstances. Rather than tilling the soil themselves, Jews in Palestine had hired Arabs to work the land and had become landlords.

Disappointed by the harsh realities they witnessed, they asked a leading Zionist figure, Arthur Ruppin, for a plot of land they could work by the sweat of their brows within the framework of a collective settlement, or kvutzah. Impressed by their ardour and commitment, Ruppin acceded to their request. And so the first kibbutz was created.

Named after the cereals they cultivated, Degania – the birthplace of war hero Moshe Dayan – was the forerunner of kibbutzim in the Land of Israel.

Today, as its residents prepare to mark its centenary later this year, Degania is still something of work in progress. Although it is staunchly communal in nature and largely dependent on agriculture for its livelihood, as one of its inhabitants, Itzhak Ankory, pointed out in a recent interview, Degania has privatized and industrialized itself to an astonishing degree, in keeping with current trends.

"The kibbutz has evolved," said Ankory, who was born in Degania 69 years ago, before Israel emerged as a state. "It's a living creature, changing all the time."

In fact, Degania is divided into two parts, Degania A (where Ankory lives) and Degania B, which was established in 1920 after members decided to downsize. Although Degania A and Degania B are separate entities economically, they share a school.

Lush and prosperous, with a population of about 600 and a museum chronicling its development and achievements, Degania was a place of desolation when it was established in 1909. In his memoirs, A Village by the Jordan (1960), Joseph Baratz, one of its original members, recalls that "there were no trees, only burnt grass and a few shrubs."

One hundred years ago, Palestine, inhabited by Muslim and Christian Arabs, Turks, Circassians and Jews, was a rocky, swampy wasteland rife with disease. "Nearly everybody had malaria and there were cases of yellow fever," writes Baratz. And in the epoch before air conditioning was introduced, the hot summer climate was virtually unbearable, something that Ankory can well understand. "I used to sleep on the grass, under mosquito netting," recalled Ankory, whose daughter, Nirit, lives in Toronto with her family.

The early settlers also had to contend with Bedouin marauders. As Baratz puts it, "They ambushed us and raided us for our cattle, and they didn't hesitate to shoot to kill." Indeed, the first Jewish settler in Degania was murdered by a Bedouin robber who demanded his mule.

In line with their ideological convictions, the pioneers of Degania were determined to work the land collectively rather than individually, realizing that this method was the most logical way to proceed in a hard and unyielding environment. "We knew that we needed one another's close and constant help in the harsh conditions of the new country," Baratz writes.

Nevertheless, they endured terrible hardship. Palestine, as Baratz says, was "wretchedly poor" and stagnant. There were hardly any roads, security was non-existent, and the soil had been neglected. In addition, they were there illegally, Jewish immigration having been banned by the Ottoman Turks. "Everything we did was on sufferance, through bribery and getting by," Baratz notes.

Through sheer grit, these inexperienced farmers planted eucalyptus trees to drain the malarial swamps and cultivated grain crops. By the 1930s, when Palestine was a British mandate and times were considerably better, the main crops were wheat, barley, vegetables, bananas, grapes, grapefruit, olives and alfalfa. Nowadays, the kibbutz cultivates bananas, dates, avocados, grapefruit and maintains a cowshed, a chicken run and a fish pond, all for local consumption.

Itzhak Ankory

The diamond tool factory, which Ankory once managed, commenced operations in 1996, and exports its products to such countries as the United States and Canada. "We discovered it was very, very difficult to live on agriculture alone," said Ankory, whose parents hail from Belarus and Ukraine.

In the beginning, the settlers lived in clay huts and rickety wooden cabins, shared clothes and took their meals in a common dining room. "The whole life of the kibbutz was in the dining room," writes Baratz. "This was where we ate, rested and held discussions." There is still a central dining room in Degania, but it is open only for lunch and is closed on the sabbath. Today, unlike in the past, members dine at home and live with their children. "People want more control of their lives," Ankory said.

During Degania's formative era, salaries were identical, but now there are wage differentials. And in yet another break with former practices, some kibbutzniks, 70 at last count, work outside, contributing their salaries to the collective.

Throughout its history, members have come and gone. Some, unable to cope with the difficulties, went to live in the Diaspora. Still others joined newer kibbutzim.

The pattern continues apace. Much to Ankory's regret, the vast majority of young adults eventually leave Degania, following a tour of duty in the armed forces, travel abroad and university studies.

"The kibbutz, as an institution, never attracted more than four per cent of the entire population," said Ankory. "Everybody talked about the kibbutz, but no one wanted to live on the kibbutz. Maybe it will be popular again one day. In the meantime, we've had a steady flow of city people to the kibbutz."

Despite the loss of many of its young people, he is confident about the future. As he said, "The kibbutz will survive." Personally, he loves it. "Life has been good. If you don't mind sharing, it's the right way to live."

From a security point of view, Degania has had its ups and downs. During the 1948 War of Independence, a Syrian armoured force attacked the kibbutz but was repulsed. The lead attacking tank was left as a memorial. During the postwar era, Degania was never shelled by Syria because it was out of artillery range. But in the wake of the Six Day War, and until the 1970 civil war in Jordan, the PLO regularly bombarded Degania. "It was very uncomfortable," said Ankory.

Since then, Degania, the mother of Israel's kibbutzim, has enjoyed a long and uninterrupted period of peace and tranquility.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

We're making aliyah, and you should, too

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

Guest Voice

We're making aliyah this summer, and I wanted to seize this opportunity to encourage others to do the same.

But I must disclose that this is the third draft of this article, and it's not that writing is difficult for me, because it's not. The first draft was about how my wife and I are following our four kids, who are all going to be in Israel, with the intention to stay, by this summer. And that first article was about how I – as a rabbi of Kehillat Shaarei Torah in Toronto for 15 years – and my wife, Joyce, have conflicted feelings about leaving people with whom we have become close.

The second article was about how life in Israel is just different – Shabbat not Sunday, Rosh Hashanah not New Year's, the family-type feeling that everyone is connected, how we feel at home, and how we cry for kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit as we would for a member of our own family.

But that's not really why I'm writing this article.

I'm not the only person making aliyah this summer. For years, there have been many fine Jews from Toronto and many from across Canada who have moved to Israel to make it their home. And many will move this year. And they all have my respect.

But I am a rabbi, and I want our story to motivate others.

So I will tell you what I really feel. I am writing this article because I know there are a lot of Jews who want to make the move and have not. I know there are plenty of reasons, plenty of complications, conflicted feelings and insecurity that holds people back. And truly, who am I to pass judgement, I of many years tarrying?

So I will tell you what I feel, and I have no doubt that my experience will resonate with many.

Living in Canada is great. We have peace. We have a pleasant and polite society. We have a standard of living that is nothing short of regal in the history of mankind. We have universal health care, a terrific Jewish community, wonderful schools and great weather. And for many, this is where our family resides and we appreciate living close to family.

But a peaceful life leaves me squirming. I want something more. All of us who have been to Israel have felt something different – a sense of belonging, an inkling that we are walking in the land of history, a sense that maybe there is more to life than meets the eye, that there is a spiritual plane that seems a bit more accessible in Israel.

There's nothing like Shabbat in Jerusalem – for all Jews, secular and religious. Everyone feels the Shabbat Bride, the Queen embracing the city at sunset. We feel we belong.

We feel it, and then we shelve it. But it nags at us. We feel satisfied with our rich and full Canadian Jewish experience – yet that feeling nags at us. For many of us, we know in our hearts that in Israel, we will be the Jews we can and want to be. We will lead a fuller Jewish life, a fuller life for our children. We feel it, and then we shelve it.

Then we visit Israel again and we feel it once more – and we read the news and we feel it. Not that it's a pure and bright flash of brilliance before our eyes. No, there are far too many complications, challenges and difficulties: How will we make a living? How will we manage the language. How can we leave our family? (This question is kind of ironic for Canadian Jews, the vast majority of whom are immigrants, children of immigrants or the grandchildren of immigrants, many of whom left family behind to come here.)

So we suppress the thoughts again.

You see, I feel I'm doing what many others want to do. No one has said to us, "What? Are you nuts?" – well, at least not to our faces. Because for many of us, the love of Israel, the ideal of aliyah and the Zionist dream are things we imbued with our mother's milk. It's an unquestioned part of what we truly feel – that our lives would be historic, heroic, more meaningful, holier and richer if we were to live in Israel.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks

Even if we define our Jewish living culturally and politically – loving Jewish music and Jewish art, carrying placards and standing with Israel and teaching our children a love of Israel – we feel the tug, for Israel is the epicentre of our Jewish definition. Yet we suppress our feelings with the inertia of life.

And those of us who send our children to Jewish schools, to saturate them with our same love of Israel, we feel the tug.

And those of us who define our Jewish lives religiously, who learn Torah, pray for the return of the Shchinah to Yerushalayim, who send our children – no actually, push our children – to go learn in the great brain trust of Jewish learning that are the yeshivas and seminaries of Israel today, well, I have no doubt that what I have written resonates with you. You know the squirm – the shifting in our seats when we hear of others' aliyah, wondering if we could do it, too. The flights of fancy thinking of those powerful and authentic moments of true prayer we felt that one time, wondering if a life of spiritual authenticity awaits us in that place while we continue in our spiritual exile. We know that our souls would feel truly at home in the land of the Shchinah and her Torah.

That's why I wrote this article. I wanted to articulate what so many of us feel. And I wanted to make myself an example. We, Joyce and I, have all the same reasons to shelve the tug, to ignore the squirm. And we have many reasons to succumb to the tug. But I do know for sure that the reasons to ignore the tug are all of this world, while the reasons to succumb to the tug are deep in the heart and in the soul.

And it is to the tug of the heart and to the soul that we succumb.

Please join us.

Until he leaves for Israel, Rabbi Reuven Tradburks is spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah in Toronto.

Jewish Life

Time to renegotiate

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

For weeks, GM and Chrysler have been warning that unless their workers make major wage concessions, the companies would be forced to file for bankruptcy, leading to further job losses. These demands have come despite the fact the automakers are under contract to honour existing agreements and that the autoworkers union has already made many "painful" concessions, while bondholders to whom billions of debt is owing have yet to make any concessions at all.

While one is legally and morally obligated to fulfil the terms of a contract, practically speaking, it just may not be possible to do so. Included in the mitzvot of the Torah is the prohibition of asking for payment of a debt knowing full well that the debtor is in no position to do so. Asking for payment in such a situation, besides being pointless, makes the debtor feel hurt and embarrassed. So sensitive is the Torah to such hurt feelings that the creditor may not even pass by or greet the debtor – such as wishing the debtor a Shabbat Shalom – as such interaction is likely to cause discomfort.

Employers are in business to make money, money often made through the efforts of labour. Yet despite the benefit one receives from the efforts of one's employees, providing employment, from the perspective of the employee, is a form of charity. Our tradition teaches that it is, in fact, the highest form of charity one can do. By providing an opportunity for the recipient to earn his wages, the employer has not only provided ongoing support, but also a sense of dignity for the employee.

There are, however, limits to charity – primarily that one is not obligated, or even allowed, to impoverish oneself so that others may benefit from one's largesse. Jewish law thus allows layoffs, plant closures and the like when necessary – which for simplicity sake we will define as when an operation is not profitable and has no realistic chance of being so in the near future.

When employees in an industry facing structural problems insist on their full wages and benefits, they may be trading short-term gain for long-term pain (something unfortunately that is at the root of our current economic crisis). Whether one likes it or not, employees and employers, especially during a recession, are essentially business partners. While they may have competing interests, those interests will only be met if they collaborate together. Not surprisingly, the unions did agree to further concessions.

Yet what if workers refuse demands to reduce wages? Such was the scenario regarding the (obscene) bonuses paid to workers at AIG insurance, some of whom were responsible for losing billions of dollars and thousands (millions?) of resultant job losses. Yet unpalatable as it may be, it appears that those bonuses were legal, the result of questionable negotiation techniques of the U.S. government. Imposing taxes payable only by AIG managers would appear to be a discriminatory tax and thus not legally enforceable. Doing so retroactively risks making government contracts meaningless this despite the emotional and moral appeal of such legislation.

Unfortunately, correct moral decisions are often just that – left to the moral conscience (or lack thereof) of individuals, but they're not legally enforceable. We can urge and hope that these bonuses are returned, but forcing them to be returned is a different matter. To do would require demonstrating that the bonus agreements were negotiated in bad faith, without full disclosure of all relevant data. Whether AIG negotiated in bad faith is something that can be debated. What cannot be debated is that as long as we value the bottom line over all else, we will continue to have moral crises that will inevitably lead to economic pain.

Hebrew books donated to Barrie community

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When a Barrie resident passed away earlier this year, he inadvertently left the local Jewish community with an extensive collection of Jewish books.

A friend of the late Richard Strothard, who wasn't Jewish, was cleaning out his apartment when she discovered about 200 books, including copies of the Torah, Tanach and Talmud, as well as books on various subjects related to Judaism, such as Judaism and Vegetarianism, Waters of Eden – Mysteries of the Mikvah, How to Run a Traditional Jewish Household, Hitler's Willing Executioners and the War Against the Jews.

Not wanting to dispose of them, she offered the collection to Barrie's Am Shalom Congregation and the city's library, but both declined to take it.

She then called Debbie Zober, who leads JACOB (an acronym for the Jewish Community of Barrie), a social and cultural networking group made up of about 50 Jewish families in Barrie with her husband, Robert.

"I got a phone call from a woman who said that her friend had just died and she needed to clean out his apartment, and he had a lot of books in his apartment," Zober said, adding that the woman told her the synagogue didn't want them because it didn't have a place to properly store them, and the library said it wasn't interested.

"She didn't know what to do with them and she was going to throw them out. When I heard that, I thought, some of them have Hebrew, so they might be prayer books, and I didn't want them going in recycling, so I said I'd have a look at them."

Zober said the woman, who didn't want to give her name, brought boxes full of the books to her home.

"We put them in the front hall, and we started looking at them. We realized what they were and how much there was and it was just unbelievable to us," Zober said.

She said that other than his interest in Jewish books (as well as other religions), she doesn't know much about Strothard, who also had teach-yourself-Hebrew books and cassettes.

"He had taught himself Hebrew. Apparently he was fluent. Half these books are in Hebrew, and half the books are in English," Zober said.

"You can see in the books that he had taught himself Hebrew, that he had written notes and plans on how he was going to teach himself Hebrew. It is really amazing."

She said she hopes people in the community, and even those who are visiting in the summer from out of town, will take advantage of the library in her home.

"I think the important thing is that people use them and that they are not just sitting here on the shelf. It is open to anyone who wants to use these books."

To learn more about the collection, email Jacob@jewishbarrie.com.

Facing History combats prejudice from new office

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In the mid-1970s, Myra Novogrodsky, then a novice secondary school teacher, was shaken up by an unanticipated reaction to the Holocaust lessons that were part of her Grade 12 European history class.

Instead of the empathy with Holocaust victims and commitment to "Never again" that Novogrodsky was hoping for, a couple of her students became fascinated by Nazism and wanted to experiment with it.

Her realization that "as a young teacher, I didn't know what I was doing" led her within a few years to a workshop run by the Toronto Jewish Congress (a precursor of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto) Holocaust Education Committee, which didn't exist when she began her career.

Speakers at the workshop had come to Toronto from a then-fledgling educational and professional development organization called Facing History and Ourselves, based in Brookline, Mass.

After hearing the organization's co-founders Margot Stern Strom, Facing History's executive director, and William Parsons, now chief of staff of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, Novogrodsky realized she had made mistakes "in terms of not identifying the issues adolescents were dealing with... obedience, authority, identity, fairness and justice."

In the early 1980s, she obtained a grant to travel with seven colleagues to Brookline for a one-week course in preparation for teaching an interdisciplinary course on the Holocaust.

Within a few years, Novogrodsky was working for the then Toronto Board of Education, teaching other teachers about teaching the Holocaust using Facing History's model. In 1999 she was seconded by York University's faculty of education, where she taught until her recent retirement.

[Frances Kraft photo]

Recently, the organization set up its first Canadian office. It received its charitable registration number last July, and opened a downtown office in October.

Novogrodsky is chair of the organization's advisory committee, and Winnipeg-born Leora Schaefer, an educator and graduate of Brandeis University's Hornstein Jewish Professional Leadership program, staffs the downtown office as program director.

Schaefer, who taught at the Toronto Heschel School in the late 1990s and has worked for Facing History for seven years, moved back to Toronto almost four years ago. Initially, she telecommuted from a home office.

Schaefer works with Jewish day schools across North America in conjunction with Facing History's Jewish education program, which includes study of prewar Jewish life. The majority of the organization's work, however, has been within the public school system. It began working in Jewish schools in 1998.

Facing History recently partnered with the Toronto District School Board to develop a new course on 20th-century genocide and crimes against humanity that has been approved by the Ontario Ministry of Education and is already being used.

It also offers programs for adults. On May 12, at 7:30 p.m., a free public session on the role of the press in upholding human rights will take place at the Miles Nadal JCC.

Titled "Can Media Make a Difference?," the event, in honour of the 60th anniversary of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights, will feature Olivia Ward, Toronto Star journalist, and Amanda Grzyb, University of Western Ontario media scholar. The discussion will be moderated by Michael Enright of CBC Radio.

Facing History has had a presence in Toronto, and to a lesser extent in British Columbia, for years. Every summer it offers a five-day seminar for teachers in the Toronto area.

One thing that makes the organization unique, said Schaefer, is its pedagogical approach. "It has to be intellectually rigorous, emotionally engaging and have that ethical reflection piece... It's critical that students are ultimately empowered."

A privately funded endeavour, Facing History needs supporters, said Schaefer. "This is an incredibly challenging time to be raising money as a new organization, but there really isn't a more critical time to support teachers."

Jewish bikers ride to remember the Shoah

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Members of the Toronto chapter of the Jewish Motorcyclists Alliance (JMA) will participate in the fifth annual "Ride 2 Remember".

The ride will see approximately 40 riders from Toronto – 30 from the city's "Yidden On Wheels" club, plus another 10 from the newly formed "Golf Riders" club – head down to Savannah, Ga., and Charleston, S.C., from May 14 to 16 in order to raise awareness about the Holocaust.

According to Yidden On Wheels member and ride co-chair, Steve Stein, the Toronto riders represent the largest JMA contingent on the 2009 ride.

The alliance calls itself "a worldwide association of Jewish motorcycle clubs" representing more than 3,500 motorcycle enthusiasts. Members from as far off as Australia and Israel will also take part in this year's event.

This year, the JMA will raise funds for the Holocaust Learning and Research Library and the Remember Project, educational initiatives sponsored by the Jewish communities in Savannah and Charleston, respectively.

As of late April, the alliance had raised more than $27,000 (US) for the initiatives, with Toronto chapters contributing more than $3,400 (US), Stein told The CJN.

Last year the JMA raised approximately $60,000 (US) for the Heartland Holocaust Education Fund of Nebraska.

"We expect and hope that donations will accelerate as the event draws nigh," Stein wrote to The CJN via e-mail.

In Omaha for 2008 R2R. From left, Henry Winokur, Washington, DC; Steve Stein, Toronto; Sid Rochwerg, Toronto

"The ride organizing committee… is fully cognizant of the extraordinary challenges of raising funds in the current economic environment, and thus we have not set a [fundraising] goal."

Stein added: "As the number of Holocaust survivors inexorably diminish, every year we ride…, so that we and the world not forget the six million who were murdered [in the Shoah].

"We feel that the worldwide Jewish community is in the greatest danger since the Holocaust. We are in an era of increasing Holocaust denial and state-sponsored declarations that call for the destruction of Israel. Our mission is to counter the culture of hostility toward Israel and the Jewish people that is taking hold in the Western world."

Yom Hazikaron

WAR HERO: Howard Cossman, left, a Machal volunteer and sergeant of the 72nd battalion of the Israeli army during the 1948 War of Independence, recently met Downtown Jewish Community School Grade 4 student Joseph Blanc, grandson of David Azrieli of the Azrieli Foundation. Cossman spoke to DJCS students about his experiences in 1948 and what motivated him to volunteer to go to Israel during the war. After the lecture, Joseph introduced himself to Cossman, noting that Cossman was featured in the book that his grandfather wrote, titled Rekindling the Torch: The Story of Canadian Zionism. Cossman and Azrieli were in the same unit in Israel in 1948. Thanks to the Azrieli Foundation, every parent at the lecture received a copy of the book.

REMEMBERING HEROES: On Yom Hazikaron (Israeli Memorial Day), students from Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Middle School were moved by a special presentation given by Zev Golan, author of the book Free Jerusalem: Heroes, Heroines and Rogues Who Created the State of Israel. Pictured, back row from left, are Jonathan Clodman, Liron Porges, Dan Amar, Golan, Zachary Mincer, and Deena Spivak; and front, Abraham Train, left, and Josh Grosh.

YOM HAZIKARON COMMEMORATION: Members of the Israeli youth movements Tzofim (wearing white shirts) and Hashomer Hatzair lay a wreath at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue as part of a Yom Hazikaron ceremony last week. The event paid tribute to 22,570 soldiers who died defending Israel, and 1,723 Israeli civilians killed in terror attacks since the founding of the state.

BETH TIKVAH SYNAGOGUE

is proud to present

THE RABBI EMERITUS LECTURE SERIES

Rabbi Avraham Feder, Rabbi Emeritus and Senior Scholar of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, will once again lead us in two inspiring emeritus lectures, Tuesday, May 12th and Wednesday, May 20th as well as an evening of song on Thursday, May 14th.

This is one of the most popular events at Beth Tikvah, so mark these dates in your calendars and come early!

1. Tuesday, May 12th at 8:00 p.m.
   "Peace, Reality, and Destiny"
   Following the recent election and the forming of a new government in Israel, the issues of deepest concern remain: the pursuit of some kind of non-violent arrangement with the Palestinians, the threat of a nuclear Iran, the economic melt-down, and the ongoing challenge to Israel's and the Jewish People's morale.

2. Thursday, May 14th at 8:00 p.m.
   An Evening of Song
   To highlight the Joy of Israel and the World of Being Jewish

3. Wednesday, May 20th at 8:00 p.m.
   "The Devil, Don Juan, and Jacob-Israel"
   Through a comparative literary analysis, the discussion will relate to the well-known stories of Faust and Mephistopheles, the adventures of Don Juan, juxtaposed to the struggles of the biblical Jacob-Israel who wrestles his whole life with angels and demons. All these stories will be viewed against the background of the attempt to understand the eternal conflict between good and evil

The Community is invited to attend; doors open at 7:30 p.m.
There is no charge.

CJPAC party links politicians, young professionals

The booze was flowing, the music was blaring and the guests were shmoozing with Canadian politicians from all levels of government at the third annual Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) Action party.

The event – held at Andrew Richard Designs in downtown Toronto and co-chaired by Jessica Fenton, Jonathan Goldman, Hartley Lefton and Lauren Levy – attracted about 650 young professionals between the ages of 25 and 40 and about 30 cabinet ministers, MPs, MPPs and Toronto city councillors.

Among those who attended were Canada's minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, Jason Kenney, Conservative MP Peter Kent, Liberal MP Ken Dryden, Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs Pierre Poilievre, NDP MP Olivia Chow, and Conservative MPP Peter Shurman.

The April 23 party featured live music, a DJ, open bar, appetizers, desserts and an opportunity to network with some of the most influential people in the country, said Josh Cooper, executive director of CJPAC, a national, independent, non-partisan organization that has been working to engage the Jewish community in the political process since 2005.

"We had the largest turnout of elected officials and the widest range of elected officials [than ever before]," Cooper said.

This year, for the first time, an Action party was also held in Montreal a month earlier, attracting about 300 members of the Jewish community, as well as 23 politicians.

Cooper said he hopes the young professionals who are new to CJPAC and the Action party will become more politically active and engaged in advocacy that will benefit Canada-Israel relations.

"If they see something they like, and they want to thank a member of Parliament, our job is to provide them with the tools to be able say, 'Thank you,' and to speak out when they see something they don't agree with," Cooper said.

Some CJPAC members have even maintained friendly relationships with elected officials they met at the Action parties, he said.

"We now have 650 new or renewed activists who will be actively involved with CJPAC," he said, adding that the $80 ticket included a $25 membership fee to CJPAC.

At first, we didn't think Zareinu was the right place for Jonah...

... but once we learned about the opportunity to be a part of Zareinu's first-ever integrated preschool, we never hesitated to enroll our son. With the help of the wonderful staff and their expertise, Jonah has thrived in a language-rich and nurturing preschool environment, infused with Jewish experiences and traditions.

For twenty years the Zareinu Educational Centre has been devoted to providing quality instructional and therapeutic services in a Jewish context to children with developmental and physical disabilities in the GTA. Here are just some of what Zareinu's has to offer:

Early Intervention
Children at risk under two years of age and their parents spend two mornings a week with some of the most experienced early childhood professionals in the GTA learning how to maximize learning and skill development.

Integrated Preschool
Children up to 4 years old with physical and developmental disabilities play and learn together with typically developing youngsters in an environment which promotes language skills, physical growth, social play skills and yiddishkeit.

Boys' and Girls' Yeshiva
Young adults ages 15-21 spend their mornings deeply involved in Jewish studies and their afternoons learning practical vocational skills both in the classroom and on job sites. This programme is in co-operation with Jewish Vocational Services.

BBYO teens stay up all night for Israel

Compiled by CJN Staff

BBYO's Lake Ontario Region members held an Up All Night for Israel event in support of Canadian Magen David Adom (CMDA) at Beth Radom Synagogue recently.

At the April 25 event, national executive director of CDMA, Arnold Rosner, spoke to the teens about Magen David's operations and recognized their efforts in raising more than $1,200 through the Up All Night initiative.

Rosner told the teens that the funds would be used toward the purchase an emergency airway passage pack by Magen David, Israel's sole national emergency, medical, ambulance, and blood services society.

The teens also participated in a training session of Krav Maga, the official self-defence system of the Israel Defence Forces, led by Rob Ferreira of Krav Maga Toronto.

"The IDF training was definitely one of the highlights for me," said Grade 9 student Jesse Freedman, who recently joined BBYO. "But the midnight falafel buffet and the Israeli folk dancing were also incredible."

The event was one of BBYO's first under the movement's new Stand Up campaign.

"Stand Up is BBYO's service, social justice, advocacy and philanthropy campaign that promotes teens getting involved in causes important to them," said Kevin Goodman, program director for BBYO's Lake Ontario Region.

For more information about BBYO in the GTA, contact Kevin Goodman at 416-398-2004, ext. 222, or kgoodman@bbyo.org.

Emma Alimi, left, and Bailey Bernknopf, right, of BBYO's Beth Radom chapter, are shown defence techniques by Rob Ferreira of Krav Maga Toronto.

La Fondation Culturelle Canada-Israel

Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation is thrilled to present Israel Makes Music on Tuesday, May 19th at 8 pm at the Glenn Gould Studio, 250 Front St. West.

This quartet of highly talented young Israeli musicians are all America-Israel Cultural Foundation scholarship winners and have been named Distinguished Musicians during their IDF service. There is little doubt that the young people you will hear at Israel Makes Music will be the superstars of tomorrow.

The chamber music concert programme will be in the format of a "guided concert", where the performers will provide an historical context for each composition, as well as an introduction to some of the musical themes.

This promises to be a wonderful evening of music, followed by a dessert reception, with an opportunity to meet these remarkable young musicians.

Tickets are $20, and are available for ordering through Ticketweb www.ticketweb.ca or 1.888.222.6608 or through the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation office at 416.932.2260.

'An economic reality that we have to reckon with'

she has worked with for their commitment and enthusiasm and said she looked forward to the future they were building for the movement.

Rabbi Offner expressed regret over the layoffs initiated by URJ. Addressing the situation in Canada specifically, she said that Rabbi Sobel "has been a great leader of Reform Judaism and we feel dreadful about losing her, but we have an economic reality that we have to reckon with… that is larger than we are. We can't control it. We can only respond to it."

Instead of the current regional URJ offices, congregations will be served by four "congregational support centres."

In Canada, congregations from Victoria to Regina will fall under the aegis of a centre in Los Angeles, while other Canadian Reform congregations will be served by its counterpart in Chicago. The other two centres will be based in New York and Atlanta.

"I think it's something that was necessary and important in terms of moving us into the future," Rabbi Offner said.

"We hope the congregations are affected in a positive way."

Carole Sterling, president of the CCRJ and – until June 7, – of Temple Sinai Congregation, said there is "some uncertainty" over the change, but also "a lot of excitement.

"We do believe it will be a much better model for delivery of service."

She added that, because of the timing of the economic downturn, its effect on Canadian congregations' membership renewals won't be fully apparent until next year.

In related news, the Reform movement's rabbinical school may close two of its three U.S. campuses. The board of governors of Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion will meet this month to discuss ways of dealing with the school's financial problems, including whether to keep open just one of its three campuses in Los Angeles, New York and Cincinnati. Other alternatives include merging academic programs while keeping more than one campus open.

In a letter to members of the college community, president Rabbi David Ellenson said HUC faces a $3-million deficit this year because of declines in its endowment and dues paid by Reform congregations, among other funding problems. He said his salary and those of other top administrators have already been cut by 10 per cent and tuition will also be raised.

Walk with Israel responds to anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism

May 24 event celebrates 60 years of Canada's recognition

The 2009 United Jewish Appeal Walk with Israel takes place on Sunday, May 24, rain or shine.

Husband and wife team Bruce and Lianne Leboff, chairs of this year's Walk with Israel. (Courtesy of Macdonell Photography)

By Daniel Horowitz

With many organizations and individuals questioning the legitimacy of Israel as a Jewish State, the chairs of this year's Walk with Israel see the event as the perfect opportunity for Toronto's Jewish community and other friends of Israel to demonstrate their support.

"We feel that it's important to join the Walk every year, but this year in particular we need to walk together as a community to show our pride in, and solidarity with Israel," said Lianne Leboff, who is chairing the Walk with her husband Bruce. Not only did they grow up walking the Walk, but Lianne still proudly holds on to her Walk completion certificates from the 1970s.

"I think it's vital today, in light of worldwide anti-Semitism exemplified by Iranian President Ahmadinejad, anti-Israel hatred on our campuses, and ongoing attempts to deny Israel's legitimacy as a Jewish State, that we show Canada, Israel and the rest of the world, regardless of our religious or political affiliations, that we will remain unwavering in our support for Israel."

The United Jewish Appeal Walk with Israel - which will take place - rain or shine - on Sunday, May 24, will mark 2009 as the 60th anniversary of official recognition of Israel by Canada.

"Canada has shown itself to be a leader in taking a stand on the international stage when it comes to Israel," explained Bruce. "Our Jewish community particularly appreciates the fact that Canada was the first country in the world to withdraw from this year's Durban II conference in Geneva. Prime Minister Harper and Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff have demonstrated leadership in their strong support for Israel based on so many shared values with Canada. This historic bond between Canada and Israel should be recognized and celebrated and the Walk with Israel is a perfect opportunity to do so."

While many married couples may consider co-chairing an event of this magnitude as unwise, the Leboffs are finding it much to their liking, largely because of their shared commitment to Israel.

"The fact that we know each other so well has definitely helped," said Bruce. "We are equally committed to Israel and to a strong Jewish community and we have our individual strengths, which has facilitated the division of responsibilities in chairing this important annual event. We approach this project as a team and we hope that we are setting an example for our three daughters. We are also so appreciative of the tremendous role played by UJA staff in making the Walk happen. We hope to have record-breaking participation from the community this year."

Campaign 2010 Chairs energized by trip to Israel

After returning to Toronto following four intense, eighteen-hour days in Israel, many of us might still be fumbling through the day, recouping our senses.

That is not the case, however, with three Torontonians who recently traveled together on a fact-finding mission to Israel, in preparation to lead United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2010.

The mission took the Toronto trio to Eilat, Sderot, Jerusalem and Bat Yam, where they met with members of that city's large Ethiopian immigrant community.

Debbie Kimel and Ken Tanenbaum, the incoming chairs of this year's campaign, as well as the new chair of Women's Philanthropy, Andrea Cohen, came back to Toronto following their whirlwind trip, energized, educated and enthusiastic about their roles.

"Those four full days together in Israel certainly laid the foundation for a strong working relationship among us," said Tanenbaum, whose role as one of the campaign chairs continues what has become a family tradition. His grandfather Max chaired the annual campaign in 1961 as did his father Larry, in 1999, with Brent Belzberg.

"I had three key takeaways from our trip," offered Tanenbaum. "First, that we have incredibly talented and energized people in Israel who are creating thoughtful programs, leveraging our dollars and delivering remarkable results. Second, our dollars are focused on lifting people up. We're really strengthening Israel through our investment in people. Third, the wonderful programs and the incredible team there have attracted the attention of Israeli philanthropists who want to partner with us, thus maximizing our impact on the country."

"While our Israel mission was for educational purposes, it also gave each of us the opportunity to put real faces to each of the projects UJA's campaign supports through United Israel Appeal (UIA) in Israel," explained Kimel. "For example, after participating in the groundbreaking at the Yoseftal Hospital in Eilat, a radiologist tapped me on the shoulder to say thank you to Toronto for improving the quality of life and health care in Eilat. By meeting and talking to people we partner with in Israel, and by listening to the stories of the recipients, we were all able to come back to Toronto with a clear understanding of the impact UJA gifts make."

"Potential donors to Women's Philanthropy need to know how challenging life is in Israel," said Cohen. "We do excellent work in Israel with various agencies and Israeli philanthropists, to ensure that Israelis have a better quality of life. We help to integrate Ethiopian immigrants, we provide support in Sderot, we are building the new emergency wing in the only hospital in Eilat, which has not been renovated in 60 years, and we provide help for Israel's youth-at-risk. At home, in Toronto, ten percent of the Jewish community – approximately 20,000 – live below the poverty line, and we provide for them as well. The people we met on this mission have helped to inspire me to do the very best I can to educate other women about the needs faced by Jews in Israel and in our own community."

"I believe that two of the common threads that bind us as a Jewish people are a sense of collective responsibility and a love for Israel," explained Tanenbaum. "Our UJA campaign is an efficient and effective way for our community to maximize its impact across the spectrum of Jewish needs."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Recent headlines in Israeli and Canadian newspapers seemed to tell of a remarkable development: "Iran will honor any two-state decision made by Palestinians" (Jerusalem Post, April. 26); "Ahmadinejad 'fine' with two-state solution" (Ynetnews, Apr. 26); "Iran prepared to back Palestinian deal with Israel, Ahmadinejad says" (Globe and Mail, April 27); "Iranian president appears to recognize Israel's right to exist for first time" (National Post, April 27).

If true, these reports indicate a revolutionary change in the thinking of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who had just come from the United Nations' anti-racism conference in Geneva, where he once again vilified Israel.

The only problem is that the journalists' interpretation of Ahmadinejad's intent was simply incorrect. The headlines reflect a misunderstanding of an interview with Ahmadinejad on ABC's This Week (April 26).

Host George Stephanopoulos tried to pin Ahmadinejad down on whether he would support a peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinians that would result in a two-state solution.

At first, Ahmadinejad would only say that Iran supports the "legal rights" of the Palestinian people, code for the "right of return" of the Palestinians to present-day Israel, which would amount to the destruction of Israel as the homeland of the Jewish people.

Stephanopoulos plowed on, asking again: "If the Palestinians sign an agreement with Israel, would Iran support that?" Ahmadinejad answered: "Whatever decision they take is fine with us."

Many in the media took these words as a breakthrough in Iran's adamant refusal to recognize Israel.

However, Jim Lederman, senior Israel analyst for Oxford Analytica, explained during a conversation that "since the time of [former Palestinian Authority president Yasser] Arafat, the term 'a decision of the Palestinian people' has been a code word for a vote in which all Palestinians, including refugees and expatriates, such as those living in Central America, Brazil, Nigeria and the United States, could take part. Stephanopoulos, like most journalists who are unfamiliar with the political code words that are used, was unable, despite all his efforts, to explain to his audience the true meaning of Ahmadinejad's words.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejd

"The result of such a vote, involving millions of people, on particularly sensitive subjects such as the 'right of return' would be predetermined."

Meanwhile, as reported by the news service AFP ("Iran should act to back two-state solution: U.S.," April 28), "[U.S.] State Department spokesman Robert Wood said the United States wanted Iran to 'play a positive role in the region, which up until now it hasn't.'

"'If Iran wants to show goodwill, it should encourage those forces that it supports that are opposed to a two-state solution to cease their opposition and work constructively toward helping us reach that two-state solution,' he said."

Even the AFP story contradicts itself regarding Ahmadinejad's intentions. The lead paragraph states that Iran's president "said Tehran could accept a two-state solution." Later, it notes: "Ahmadinejad did not specify if Iran would recognize Israel if there were a two-state solution creating an independent Palestine." Indeed, Ahmadinejad never spoke directly about accepting Israel.

As far as playing a "constructive role in the region," Iran stands accused by moderate Arab states of fuelling Hezbollah's destabilizing designs in Lebanon, underwriting Hamas' and Islamic Jihad's radical rejectionism in Gaza, and, most recently, seeking to undermine Egypt's stability by funding Hezbollah cells on Egyptian soil.

In "Iran's New Target: Egypt," (Wall Street Journal, April 28), Abdel Monem Said Ali, director of the Al Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo, wrote about Tehran's growing thirst for influence and power in the Arab Middle East.

Iran, wrote Said Ali, is making a "determined effort to sabotage Egypt's attempts at regional stability… Egypt's persistent attempts to bring about peace in this arena and its encouragement of other Arab countries to follow its path with Israel threaten to deprive Iran of the single most potent issue that it can exploit to further its radical agenda. Thus Tehran seeks to undermine the prospects for this peace."

Book makes case to scrap rights commissions

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's safe to say Ezra Levant doesn't have a large fan base inside Jewish organizations that, under various community relations mandates, are expected to defend Jews from the dangers posed by anti-Semites.

Levant has stepped on more than a few toes with his caustic critique of Jewish groups that, he says, support human rights commissions' restrictions on free speech in order to tackle what he considers to be a non-existent threat posed by neo-Nazi nobodies posting material on the Internet.

But in his recent best-selling book, Shakedown, McLelland & Stewart, the Calgary-based author goes further, alleging that in the 1960s, Canadian Jewish Congress even bankrolled the Canadian Nazi Party because it wanted to justify its own existence by having a real enemy to contend with.

That prompted a response from Congress, which pointed out Levant relied on a mistaken Maclean's article from 1966. The extent of the "bankrolling" was an expense incurred by a private investigator hired by Congress to investigate the Nazi group who bought a bottle of rum, stated a letter from Congress co-president Rabbi Reuven Bulka. Rabbi Bulka went on, however, to acknowledge that Levant's book "does open the door to a potentially serious debate on human rights law."

Indeed, in Shakedown, Levant offers a compelling case why the hate speech provisions in human rights legislation should be abolished, if not the commissions themselves. The commissions have become superfluous in pursuing their original mandates of ending discrimination in the provision of apartments and jobs. Employment and landlord and tenant legislation already does that, he says.

What we have now is a bureaucracy staffed by left-wing activists expanding the reach of the state to limit legitimate expressions of free speech to satisfy groups or individuals who feel aggrieved. That's not a bargain most Canadians feel comfortable with, Levant argues.

In an interview with The CJN, Levant said much of the work of human rights commissions (there are 14 in Canada, one for each province and territory and one federal body) has gone under the radar. The mainstream media has largely ignored them, and most Canadians know little about them until they have to face a complaint themselves. "People feel trapped" by the commissions and "appalled at the lack of natural justice," he said.

Levant's own run-in with the Alberta commission came in 2006 as a result of the now-defunct Western Standard magazine, which he published, printing cartoons that depicted the Muslim prophet Muhammad. Publication of the cartoons in Denmark inflamed the Muslim world and led to riots and deaths. The Western Standard made an editorial decision to print the cartoons so its readers could see for themselves what had prompted such a violent reaction.

Around the same time, columnist Mark Steyn and Maclean's magazine were hauled before the B.C. Human Rights Commission after the magazine ran excerpts from Steyn's best-seller, America Alone, which examined the threat posed by radical Islamists. The two cases became causes celebre and shone a light on the commissions.

Levant maintains both cases were dismissed because of the notoriety attached to them, but in most instances, victims capitulate because the deck is stacked against them. Complainants don't incur any expense, while it is costly to present a defence. Adjudicators aren't neutral, but are often political activists who side with the complainant and who have no particular legal training. Disclosure is hit and miss. (Jewish groups argue the commissions should be reformed, not abolished.)

Dragged before the Alberta Human Rights Commission, Levant made it "my personal mission" to repeal the provision limiting free speech.

"But that's not enough," he said. The vast majority of cases don't deal with allegations of hate.

For example: in British Columbia, a woman was fired by McDonald's because a skin condition prevented her from washing her hands as often as mandated by the restaurant chain. She alleged discrimination based on a disability and, amazingly, won a judgment of $50,000.

In another case, a pizza delivery woman complained about the violent, sexually explicit music being played in the workplace. She won a settlement of $3,500 four years after the restaurant manager agreed to change the music from CDs to radio.

According to Levant, human rights commissions have elevated everyday disputes to the level of human rights. But it is their assault on free expression that should concern Canadians most, he said.

Ezra Levant

And in that area, Jewish organizations are out of step with their constituencies. "I don't think Jews are for censorship," he said. "As a minority, we were subject to censorship."

Levant dismisses the argument that anti-Semitic words could lead to genocide. "The presence of anti-Semitic words did not lead to the Holocaust," he said. "It was laws passed by the Nazis that led to genocide." You are mistaken if you believe that a government that would kill you would be deterred by the rulings of human rights commissions, he added.

The night before his interview with The CJN, Levant was on a panel in London that attracted 600 people to hear a discussion on free speech and the commissions. His book is number 3 on the Globe and Mail's best-seller list. Editorials across the country have come out against the commissions' restrictions on free speech, as did an investigation by Prof. Richard Moon for the federal commission. Alberta is taking another look at them.

"There are very positive signs. I think change is going to come," Levant said.

Give Thought When Choosing Your Investments

Michael Korman, B. Comm, FMA, FCSI
Financial Advisor

What do you do when you find out your pension plan has lost millions of dollars or your RSP's have lost thousands of dollars in the stock market? I know from client experience, it pays to understand your personal finances and the business cycle.

Too often, I see prospective clients who pick a few mutual funds as part of the offering of either a group RSP, some form of personal pension plan, or who acquire an investment counsel process or capital pool assuming someone they do not know will look after their best interests.

If you don't have the time to understand what is affecting your money it may be to your benefit to seek a second opinion and consider a full time fee-based professional. The business cycle can dramatically impact your money and it really is important that someone works with you to help you understand the economy's impact on your money. I try to explain to my clients that there is a difference in a total wealth management big picture approach and a stock market approach to money. I prefer the total wealth management approach for retail clients.

Here is an example of what I mean.

A cardiologist recently requested an appointment. Her $1.2 million portfolio consisted of a capital pooled fund and one discretionary program. The pool was essentially a duplication of the TSX top 60 dividend stocks yielding about 3.2% while the discretionary program was a copy of the bond index with an extra fee. The bond index represented about 25% of the portfolio while the equity portion represented 75%. The mandate of the equity manager was all stock with no ability to move to more than 20% cash. The result was a net reduction of about $254,000 CDN on the portfolio considering the cash position.

A better understanding on the part of the advisor of this doctor's financial picture and obligations, and how the business cycle affects the bond and equity markets, may have prevented such an onerous amount of equity being used in the doctor's portfolio at this point in time.

Typically at this phase of the business cycle, there is lending available to staple stock market businesses such as medical supply and health care companies, food processors, larger food retailers, cable companies — virtually anything that has consistent strong operating cash flow. In my past corporate experience, banks lend money to businesses based on balance sheet strength, not on what companies say they earn. Your money invested today in your pension plan is affected by the fundamental weakness in the consumer's bank account. The threat to the consumer is the loss of disposable income from aggregate job losses and the resulting loss of household equity borrowing power.

So what can you do to gain better control over your money and perhaps end up with a better retirement and pension? Hire someone who understands how operating cash in companies can affect their share price or unit value. Also make sure your advisors have a good understanding of the bond and business cycle and don't assume just anyone has the background to understand the valuation of a stock because they are in the business. Most medical clients I know have little time to consider what impacts their money.

Israeli survivors cope better with trauma: study

Comparative study conducted at Haifa U

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Holocaust survivors in Israel cope better with trauma than survivors in the Diaspora, says the author of a Haifa University comparative study on the long-term effects of the Holocaust.

"It was found that living in Israel rather than in other countries can serve as a protective factor for psychological well-being," Efrat Barel told The CJN in an interview.

Barel, a research fellow at the Center for the Study of Child Development, also discovered that survivors adapted to Israel just as well as non-survivors, even though they had to deal with more problems.

"Survivors' attempts to reach [Palestine] were met with resistance by the British mandatory government," she said. "Next were the struggles associated with immigration: unemployment, personal and social adaptation and assimilation."

Finally, survivors had to cope with the perception that the Holocaust should be suppressed from Israel's national consciousness.

Nevertheless, survivors adapted no less well to Israel than non-survivors, reported Barel, who conducted her study under the supervision of Avi Sagi-Schwartz, a professor at Haifa University's department of psychology.

Asked to account for this phenomenon, Barel pointed to two possible explanations.

"The first may be found in the strains and stresses inflicted on Israelis... by the Arab-Israeli conflict. Constant existential threats may contribute to lower psychological well-being in both groups, which would explain the absence of differences between them.

"The second explanation is based on the notion of man's search for meaning, which emphasizes the healing power rooted in the desire to find meaning, even in anguish. This notion is relevant in particular to Israel's postwar reality.

Efrat Barel

"Survivors who immigrated to Israel were part of a large community with a shared vision – building and shaping the Jewish state. Perhaps this served as a protective factor that helped them achieve a new sense of meaning in their lives. This was not the situation for survivors who settled in countries other than Israel."

Scarred as they were by their terrible experiences, survivors exhibited remarkable resilience in their daily lives, noted Barel, currently a lecturer at the Max Stern Academic College of Emek Yezreel.

Barel added that they still bear the pain of their past in the form of various psychiatric symptoms, particularly post-traumatic stress.

"Our findings are especially relevant for child survivors," she said.

"Most survivors were children during the Holocaust. Special attention should be paid to them. As they approach old age, they encounter new challenges, including loss of spouse, retirement and health care problems that may reactivate their extreme early stress.

"Therapeutic interventions are, therefore, sometimes needed for coping with the reactivated stress."

The psychiatric needs of survivors tend to be overlooked because their resilience has masked vulnerabilities and difficulties, she observed.

In general, they develop more frequent symptoms such as depression and anxiety.

Yet in other areas relating to functionality – physical health, psychological welfare and cognitive functioning – there were no significant differences between survivors and non-survivors.

Nor were there disparities in their longevity rates, she noted.

In short, she said, her findings underscore the fact that survivors in Israel display both vulnerability and resilience.

Barel's study is based on 59 earlier studies encompassing 71 sample groups and 12,746 survivors.

"I am interested in trauma and stress, especially in resilience from trauma," she said of her decision to explore this topic.

"I am not personally connected to the Holocaust, but this dimension of Jewish history is part of my identity. I believe that through studying Holocaust survivors we will be able to uncover the enduring effects of massive trauma and extreme stressful experiences."

Independent centenarian doesn't feel 100

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Margaret Kamin-Zysman will be 100 years old on May 16.

At an interview in her apartment, where she lives alone, the sprightly centenarian said, "I am 100 years old. Isn't that ridiculous? I don't feel it. And I don't look it."

There's no doubt that she could be taken for a person in her 80s, both mentally and physically. She has some hearing loss, but her memory is exceptional.

Born in Poland, she had a long career in the theatre business in Toronto and was active in fundraising .

Her memoirs were published in 1996.

Before Memoirs of Margaret Kamin-Zysman was published, she had been making notes about her life to give to her children and grandchildren, but she discovered that the cost of getting a book published was high.

In the mid-1990s, she saw an item in The CJN by June Callwood asking people to submit their biographies for possible publication.

"I went for an interview with June Callwood, and I sent her a few pages from my book," Kamin-Zysman said.

"I was thrilled when she told me that the book had literary value and that she would publish the book for me for $300."

In the foreword of her book, which is dedicated to her two sons, Arthur and Jules Kamin, Kamin-Zysman acknowledges Callwood. "My deep gratitude to June Callwood without whose help these memoirs would never have seen the light," she wrote.

Born Miriam Fingerhut in Bolechow, Poland, a shtetl near Lvov, Kamin-Zysman came to Canada at age 17 with her parents and two younger sisters. Her grandfather had arrived in Toronto in 1890.

Although she is fluent in six languages – English, Polish, German, Ukrainian, Yiddish and Hebrew – her first job was in a millinery factory.

"The Depression made the work sporadic," she said. "So I looked for more permanent employment."

Her mother's stepbrother, Samuel Fine, was in the theatre business. He arranged for her to work as a cashier in a theatre box office. From the 1930s to 1985, when she retired, she worked in several movie theatres, including the Towne Cinema, which used to be at Yonge and Bloor streets.

Centenarian Margaret Kamin-Zysman is seen at a Na'amat Canada tribute dinner in September 2008.

She jokes that she became known as "Margaret," because that's what her "colleagues, lovers and boyfriends" would call her.

In 1939, she married Mack Kamin. Along with raising her boys, working, singing in the Beth Tzedec Congregation and the choirs of Farband, a Yiddish-speaking labour Zionist organization, she joined Pioneer Women (now Na'amat Canada) and became an ardent fundraiser. She was a delegate at a Na'amat conference in Israel in 1965.

Her husband died in 1976, and she remarried Arthur Zysman in 1983. Although they were married for only four years, she said she was fortunate to have had two good marriages.

When asked about her independence, positive outlook in life and how she copes with problems, she said, "Throughout my life, in times of need and uncertainty, I think of my mother and ask what would she do."

Kamin-Zysman plans to lead a family sing-song at her birthday celebration.

U of T faculty club renames its card room

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In honour of its building's Jewish history, the University of Toronto's Faculty Club has renamed its card room the Primrose Room.

The building at 41 Willcocks Ave. was home to a Jewish men's club for 40 years after it was purchased in 1920. In 1959, the building, where men gathered to play cards, eat and socialize, was handed over to the expanding university for $1.

The Primrose Club moved to another location on St. Clair Avenue W., but that property has since been sold to developers and the club was disbanded.

On April 29, Faculty Club board members and people with connections to the now-defunct Jewish club gathered for a ceremony to officially change the name of the Faculty Club's card room to the Primrose Room.

The renaming was initiated by Estelle Creed Kaufman – daughter of the late Edmond Creed, president of the Primrose Club before it was expropriated by the university – who made a donation to the club.

Marvin Sazant, Creed Kaufman's cousin and a member of the Faculty Club, conducted the ceremony and read a letter of thanks from Creed Kaufman, who couldn't attend the ceremony because she lives in Flint, Mich., with her husband Benjamin Kaufman.

Marvin Sazant

In the letter – written in memory of her father, her late mother Rae Creed and her late brother Raymond Creed– she thanked the board members for recognizing the building's history.

"The roots are very beautiful and very strong," she said in a telephone interview.

Creed Kaufman also wanted to recognize former Primrose Club members, who she called "gracious and giving."

"They all volunteered and joined the 7th artillery of Canada and they were very patriotic to Canada. They were with the 7th artillery of Canada until war's end."

JDL objects to 'Israel/Palestine' conference at York

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Jewish Defence League said it plans to hold weekly demonstrations at York University to protest an upcoming two-day conference called Israel/Palestine: Mapping Models of Statehood and Paths to Peace.

The June 22-24 conference, co-sponsored by Queen's University and York, and an official part of York's 50th anniversary celebrations, will "explore which state model would be the best to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, respecting the rights to self-determination of both Israelis/Jews and Palestinians," the event's website said.

Critics of the conference are worried that while it's being promoted as a dialogue on which solution would be best to achieve peace in the region, the speakers – some of whom are active in the boycott, divestment, sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel – will present the one-state solution as the only viable option.

The website for the conference also says that "despite the current diplomatic focus on the two-state model… the conference seeks to systematically measure the two-state model against the promise of alternatives; very specifically the potential in the model of a single bi-national state."

Among the 49 confirmed speakers are Omar Barghouti, a founding member of the Palestinian BDS campaign against Israel, and Ali Abunimah, co-founder of the Electronic Intifada, a website that posts articles that accuse Israel of ethnic cleaning and labels Israel as an apartheid state.

There are also a number of Jewish speakers, but some, such as Jeff Halper, a member of an organization that "resists the Israeli occupation on the ground," and Michael Mandel, who recently published an article in Shunpiking magazine that said Israel deliberately kills "civilians for illegal political ends," share a very critical view of the Jewish state.

Meir Weinstein, the JDL's national director, said that the few people who have agreed to lend a "legitimate voice" to the conference should withdraw so as not to lend credibility to a one-sided event.

He said that as of this week, his group will be picketing every week on the sidewalk in front of York's Vari Hall rotunda.

Ed Morgan, a University of Toronto law professor and former Canadian Jewish Congress president, said he considered taking part in the conference, but backed out when he learned that it would mostly promote the view that a one-state solution is the only viable option.

In October, in an op-ed piece in The CJN, he wrote that "the notion of 'one state' is deployed by Israel's enemies as a rhetorical tactic to undermine the Jewish state."

Morgan thought it would be appropriate to "fight the fight from the inside" because the "core group that thought up the conference are perfectly good scholars at Osgoode Hall and Queen's University who hold a genuine interest in debating alternative forms of democracy in the Israeli and Palestinian context.

"But the guests are starting to outnumber the hosts, and the cynical edge of the 'one-state' crowd is showing as the proposed speakers start to bare their anti-Israel teeth," Morgan added.

In a statement on behalf of the organizing committee, conference organizers Sharry Aiken and Bruce Ryder said that "a topic as fraught and weighty as the future of Israel/Palestine," will cause everyone to "disagree passionately with at least some of the speakers."

But Aiken and Ryder said they've chosen speakers with the assistance of an international advisory committee, "based on the strength of their academic achievements and the scholarly quality of the paper proposals they submitted."

In response to the concern about the inclusion of BDS activists in the conference, Aiken and Ryder said the papers submitted "contribute to scholarly debates about the models of statehood that offer promising paths to peace, respecting the human rights and security interests of all peoples.

"We did not consider it appropriate, in an academic context, to undertake an assessment of the political opinions or political activities of the scholars who submitted paper proposals to us."

York spokesperson Richard Fisher said it's too early to characterize the conference as being one-sided, because the list of speakers and the format hasn't been fully developed.

"The organizers have no agenda on this issue one way or the other, except of course for exploring paths to peace....There is no attempt to promote one solution or the other," Fisher said.

Responding to the inclusion of speakers who support the BDS campaign, he added that "to say that a debate should not take place unless it supports our pre-disposed view on either side, we deny the very essence of academic freedom and we kill the very thing we are trying to protect."

In related news, Weinstein attended a board of governors meeting at York on April 27 to deliver a petition with about 2,800 signatures to York president Mamdouh Shoukri. The petition called on the university to stop the intimidation of Jewish students on campus, citing an incident in February during which Jewish students were barricaded in York's Hillel Lounge by students yelling anti-Israel and anti-Jewish slogans.

It also referred to "anti-Jewish and anti-Israel graffiti" and "verbal threats of physical harm," against Jewish students.

The petition demanded that York officials "enforce their official campus policy on disruptive and/or harassing behaviour."

The petition was passed on to Osgoode Hall Law School dean Patrick Monahan, York's incoming provost who also chairs York's new Task Force on Student Life, Learning and Community, which was struck earlier this year in the wake of clashes between pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian students.

YORK UNIVERSITY 50
redefine THE POSSIBLE

MY HEBREW SCHOOL IS FUN !!

Lots of kids like me go to Beit Rayim Hebrew School (it's near Bathurst and Rutherford).

WE LOVE IT!

We sing Hebrew songs. We learn about Jewish holidays, history and traditions. We do great arts and crafts. Our school goes right through to Grade 7 and qualifies us to have our Bar or Bat Mitzvah at any Conservative Synagogue.

Grade 1 is just Sundays and is the same price as Kindergarten... so everyone is happy ☺
Maybe your kids should go there too !!

Early Bird discount on tuition until May 15th

They even have special prices for young families like mine to join the Synagogue. You should check them out!

Men urged to speak out on domestic violence

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

We need a paradigm shift in our thinking about domestic violence, says Jackson Katz, an anti-sexist male activist.

"It's time to stop calling it a women's issue," said the educator, author and filmmaker who has spent years speaking out on the issue of gender violence.

Author of The Macho Paradox: Why Some Men Hurt Women and How All Men Can Help, Katz will speak at Beth Tzedec Congregation on May 20, 7: 30 p.m., during an evening sponsored by Jewish Women International Canada.

Speaking from his California home, Katz, 48, who is married with a seven-year-old son, said that domestic violence has always been seen as a women's issue, "simply because it is women that talk about it. Since they talk about it, it is seen as their problem.

"That's all wrong, though. The issue of gender violence is a man's issue, first and foremost. We need men to step forward. They need to take a more prominent role in speaking out."

He cannot name one specific incident that challenged him to step forward, he said, "but as a student at University of Massachusetts, I was 18 and I was outraged by what I saw. I knew that if I feared for my safety as many of the women students did, I would be very unhappy. I knew that I was in a position to do something."

As part of a growing movement of men who are working on the issue, he admitted that some men feel threatened by other men who speak out against sexism or domestic violence.

"They're afraid to face the issues because to deal with it, you have to admit what it means to be a man in our culture. Men are committing lots of violence, and statistics say that one in four women on a college campus will be raped. That is all messed up, and something has to be done."

When we work with women and girls in order to teach them the signs of domestic abuse and how to take care of themselves, we are able to reduce the risks, he said. "Preventing violence, however, means going to the root cause of the problem."

Katz said that early intervention is critical. "Women abuse is not genetic or biological. Some boys learn that part of being a man means being dominant and controlling over women. They feel entitled, and most boys do not learn this from watching their fathers. They learn their behaviour outside of their home.

"Young boys are as loving as young girls, but then what happens? The answer is not simple, because it is deeply rooted in the structure of society. It is not aberrational behaviour. The solutions are complex, but something has gone on and we need to face it."

In high schools and university campuses, the men need to step forward, he said. "The principals, the gym teachers, even the college presidents have to be trained to work with young men and boys in order to make violence unacceptable.

"If you are a leader in the community, by definition you need to be knowledgeable, and you need to use your platform to talk about the issue.

"Silence is complicity, and Jews have suffered for eons while others have looked on. The concept is basic. We need good men to step up."

MITZVAH DAY: Students from both campuses of Leo Baeck Day School painted a mural to brighten the walls of Baycrest. The project was part of Mitzvah Day, a tzedakah event run jointly by Leo Baeck's parents' association and Holy Blossom Temple. Students, parents and temple members also put together care packages for the homeless; planted, decorated and delivered potted plants to people who are unwell, and wrote letters in support of Israeli soldiers and humanitarian efforts in Darfur, among other projects. Pictured, from left, are Nikki Burstein, Kaitlyn Luepann, Layla Gutmann, Ben Horwitz and Paul Rotman.

Gala to raise money for thyroid centre

Compiled by CJN Staff

The fourth annual DaVinci Gala in support of the Joseph and Mildred Sonshine Family Centre for Head and Neck Disease at Mount Sinai Hospital is set for May 27 at La Primavera Hospitality and Convention Centre in Woodbridge, Ont.

Under the direction of doctors Paul Wolfish and Jeremy Freeman, the centre is a state-of-the-art facility for the diagnosis and treatment of thyroid cancer.

The most common endocrine gland malignancy, thyroid cancer affects three times as many females as males, but with modern detection techniques and treatments, the disease can be cured in more than 85 per cent of affected patients.

Mount Sinai Hospital has been a pioneer in applying thyroid ultrasound and fine needle aspiration biopsy to achieve its earliest detection.

Gala honorees are Ginetta and Ron Barbaro. For information, e-mail jren@mtsinai.on.ca or visit www.davincigala.com.

Benefit concert set for May 13

Save a Child's Heart (SACH) and Canadian Friends of Hebrew University will be hosting a benefit concert on May 13, 8 p.m. at The Toronto Centre for the Arts, featuring live performances by the world-renowned quartet, the Canadian Tenors, and international jazz sensation, Sophie Milman.

Proceeds from the evening will support Save a Child's Heart and The Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Canada's own quartet, the Canadian Tenors, will take centre stage in a live and intimate vocal performance. Dubbed "Canada's National Treasure," the group will perform a mix of music and sounds from alternative world pop, Canadian folk music and operatic arias.

Guests will also enjoy a performance by Juno Award winning jazz vocalist, Sophie Milman, who is critically acclaimed for her musicianship and popular standards. In an ensemble performance, the Toronto Heschel School Children's Choir will join the Canadian Tenors on stage for the final two performances of the evening.

Masada Siegel with her mother

A day at the spa with Mom

By MASADA SIEGEL
Special to The CJN

Tears welled in my eyes, but nonetheless, I continued with my mission.

One day, I was focused and determined, and standing in my sister Audrey's kitchen, in Boca Raton, Fla., following instructions to chop onions! My mom, Audrey and I were cooking up a storm when Mom grinned broadly and said, "This is what memories are made of." I wiped a tear from my eye and started to laugh.

Most mothers would think an exotic family vacation or a spa day is a memorable event, but for my go-getter, no-nonsense Israeli mom, a former sergeant in the Tank Division, the concept of pampering is preposterous and being productive is positively the name of the game.

Mother's Day is encompassed by one of the Ten Commandments, "Honour your mother and father." While celebrating your mother should be an everyday occurrence, it's great to have that one day a year to focus on the woman who gave us life. Most Jewish mothers are obsessed with making sure everyone is happy, eating healthy and being productive, and never take time out to look after themselves.

It was early January – not the traditional time to celebrate Mother's Day, but in the name of productivity, that is, writing an article, Mom joined me on a story. The topic was spending Mother's Day at a spa. Well, my mom, who has never spent a day at a spa in her life, agreed, shaking her head, most likely wondering how we could be related! Truthfully, I knew if it was for a work reason, she would oblige to a little pampering.

We got an early start, driving north to Carefree, Ariz., to the Boulders Resort Golden Door Spa. The spa, surrounded by huge boulders, is the ultimate relaxation resort. It includes swimming pools and scenic walking paths, and purple and pink bougainvillea adorn the garden area.

Our day at the spa got off to a slow start. We basked in the warm sunlight, and I happily munched on low-fat muffins and an egg-white omelette, while sitting by a small bubbly stream. Mom looked at me helplessly, not sure what to do. She seemed tense about relaxing, as she's not well versed in sitting around and being served.

Soon, Mom found her comfort zone, as I showed her the day's activities – yoga, Pilates, a shiatsu massage for her and a hot rocks one for me, and afternoon tea.

Moments later, we walked into the yoga room. It was mirrored and calming – well, until a limber-looking woman walked in. She introduced herself, and then to my chagrin, I realized I was in an advanced class.

Slightly mortified, I thought positive thoughts, hoping the good energy might help me survive the next hour. The class commenced. My mother, who avidly practices yoga, immediately immersed herself. People twice my age were smiling at the mirrors and posing gracefully. Meanwhile, I was wondering if I was going to be able to peel myself off the floor. Mom was grinning, putting herself in pretzel positions, while I was simply trying to breathe. Most of the class, I counted down the minutes, wondering how to stylishly contort myself into the positions, while keeping in mind that I wanted to make sure I would be able to untangle myself!

My mother, always one who makes the most of everything, took a second hour of yoga. I looked at her admiringly and said, "I'm going to have to sit this one out and take notes for the story." Truthfully, I was thinking, I'd have a better chance to survive bungee jumping off the highest bridge in South Africa than another hour of yoga!

The rest of the day consisted of more classes, amazing massages and a British-style tea. Mom was more relaxed than I have seen her in ages. She nearly ran a red light on the way home, because she was so chilled out.

My mission was complete – bond with my mother, spend the day being pampered and create some fun memories – and have a good story to write.

There are many options for Mother's Day – spending time together, sending a card to your mother or phoning her. Just fulfil one of the basic commandments.

Truthfully, I'm still not quite so sure what made me cry more, the yoga or the onions, but spending time with your mom, whether in the kitchen or the yoga room, is how memories are created. The key is having fun and being productive… Wait, did I just say that? I'm starting to sound like… well, Mom!

Happy Mother's Day!

Boycott rejected

they should continue to send e-mails to the company expressing their feelings about the issue after the vote," Elterman says.

MEC, which calls itself "Canada's leading supplier of quality outdoor gear, clothing and camping equipment," has stores in Victoria, Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, Quebec and Halifax. Anyone who buys an item at the co-op becomes a voting member.

The boycott motion was put forward by members of a group called B.C. Teachers for Peace and Global Education. Jewish groups had urged their supporters to attend the meeting to vote against it.

Tim Southam, public affairs manager for MEC, said the company had been apprehensive about antagonism at the meeting. "We're glad it proceeded in an orderly, civil manner," he said. "There were people expressing strongly held views both for and against the resolution, but it was very respectful."

He added: "The defeat of the motion is an affirmation and endorsement of our existing sourcing policies, which emphasize the factory floor and an ethical sourcing program, one we believe serves us well and serves those who make our products well. We intend to have that policy guide us in the future and improve it as best we can over time."

Elterman said the defeat of the resolution was "an important win for us, because we certainly didn't want to see the opposition encouraged."

It's not CIC Pacific region's first victory. In recent months, the organization has rallied against three demonstrations held outside B.C. liquor stores aimed at dissuading people from buying Israeli wine.

"We launched a counter-campaign to buy out Israeli wines from Vancouver-area stores, and on each of the three occasions, Israeli wines have been sold out. As a result of the demand for the product, Israeli wines are now displayed in a special section next to those made in other countries, with their own distinct identity," Elterman said.

Still, he thinks the "boycott Israel" movement won't go away.

"We'll have similar challenges in other cities in Canada and on other issues," he said. "There are so many products being made in Israel these days that there are going to be further challenges. But they will be different from this one at MEC, because the latter is a co-op and many of the other products are made for privately owned companies."

The CIC plans to urge the B.C. Teachers' Federation to more closely examine who is speaking in the name of B.C. teachers in the future, Elterman said.

British MP sues Jewish leaders, Kenney

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

British MP George Galloway is suing Immigration Minister Jason Kenney and the heads of two major Jewish groups over remarks they made about him when he was barred from entering Canada in March.

Galloway was scheduled to appear on a speaking tour in Canada but the Canada Border Services Agency denied him entry. Kenney refused to override that decision, saying he would not give special treatment to someone who gave financial aid to Hamas.

In addition to Kenney, Canadian Jewish Congress co-president Sylvain Abitbol and CEO Bernie Farber, as well as B'nai Brith Canada executive vice-president Frank Dimant were served with formal notices of a libel action.

"I welcome robust criticism, but the comments made about me crossed the line. They are not only untrue, they are outrageous," Galloway said in a statement.

Farber said "we pored over all our statements. All appear to be fair comment. It's difficult to understand what his thinking is in the libel case."

Ottawa celebrates with three-day Israel marathon

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The community came out in full force in support of Israel, mourning its losses and celebrating its 61st birthday.

For three days in a row, Ottawans were in "Israel mode," beginning with a Yom Hazikaron memorial ceremony at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre (SJCC) last Monday evening, April 27.

The following evening, the embassy of Israel hosted a lavish reception at the Fairmont Chateau Laurier Hotel for members of the diplomatic corps, politicians of all stripes, Jewish community leaders and various friends of Israel.

"This evening, we have actually passed from a memorial day. When we still have a tear in the corner of our eye, we move on to the celebration," said Ambassador Miriam Ziv as she welcomed her guests.

"This year marks 60 years of formal relations between Canada and Israel," Ziv said, adding that she expects this year to reinforce and strengthen this relationship, which is based on shared values between the two countries.

On Wednesday evening, April 29, hundreds of people of all ages celebrated Yom Ha'atzmaut with a huge party at the Ottawa Civic Centre. There were activities for all ages: children enjoyed mini-cirque performers and a hockey shoot-out. There were also casino tables and, of course, Israeli music and dancing.

The hall was decorated with palm trees and street signs, creating an atmosphere of being in Israel. Despite a straggly group of protesters outside the building, people streamed in to join others in a feeling of solidarity and celebration.

Event chair Penny Torontow welcomed everyone. "The SJCC and Vered Cultural Centre go to such great lengths to ensure that the Ottawa community celebrates with Israel on this momentous occasion. I am honoured to be part of what has become the largest event of the year. In these troubled times for Israel, it is so important to stop and celebrate," she said.

And celebrate they did. There were line-ups at the food kiosks, and people cheerily greeted friends as they strolled along "Israel's streets." Tables were set up throughout the hall with information from various groups and organizations, and there was lively Israeli dancing to the music of Yosi Levy and the Sabras.

Berlin rabbi compares present to 1930s Europe

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For years, Rabbi Chaim Rozwaski preached vehemently against Jews going to Germany.

Recently, at the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada's fourth annual Sol and Florence Kanee Distinguished Lecture Series at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, he explained how he became Berlin's chief rabbi.

"It was almost by accident, I ended up in Germany," said the child Holocaust survivor and former Winnipegger at the April 26 lecture.

In 1998, he was invited by Ron Lauder, president of the World Jewish Congress, to move to Berlin to become the dean of the new Lauder Jewish Institute and acting rabbi of the historic Rykestrasse Synagogue.

"I asked three rabbis for their advice [about accepting Lauder's offer]," Rabbi Rozwaski said.

"One said that I should go because the Germany of today is not the same Germany that was ruled by the Nazis and that I shouldn't hold the sins of the fathers against the children. A second told to me to go because I was needed and that I was the right person for the job. The third recommended that I go because I would know what to do and how to do it."

In 2000, Rabbi Rozwaski was appointed the rabbi of the Jewish community of Berlin.

Just as the Germans of today are not the same Germans of the war years, so also does the Jewish community in Germany differ considerably from that of the prewar and postwar Germany, Rabbi Rozwaski said.

During a recent visit to Winnipeg, Rabbi Chaim Rozwaski, centre, met up with his childhood friend Sid Halpern, left, and Leon Berger, his Talmud Torah teacher 60 years ago. [Myron Love photo]

The German Jewish community that emerged after the Holocaust numbered about 30,000 and included several thousand who either spent the war in hiding in Germany or were somehow exempt from arrest and execution. Those survivors were augmented by German Jews who returned from Israel and elsewhere after the war. They stayed because they were in mixed marriages or had built up successful businesses or were too sick to leave.

Of that community, there are only 7,000 to 8,000 people left, Rabbi Rozwaski said. Most of their children have immigrated to Israel, America or elsewhere.

Since the early 1990s, however, about 100,000 Russian Jews have settled in Germany. Many of them may have preferred to go to the United States, Rabbi Rozwaski said, but the Clinton administration closed that door when it ruled that Russian Jews were no longer in need of political asylum.

"Most of the Russian Jews who came to Germany have relatives in Israel," Rabbi Rozwaski said, "but they were afraid to go to Israel because of the potential for violence.

"In Germany, they were given housing, free schooling and financial assistance from the government. Germany was a viable alternative, and the level of anti-Semitism is much less than what they faced in Russia."

For older Russian Jews, though, with memories of the war, coming to Germany, – in many cases following their children – was still a hard choice. Rabbi Rozwaski recalled one elderly immigrant who broke down and cried at a Holocaust memorial event because he remembered being forced by the Nazis to shoot his own parents.

Rabbi Rozwaski presided at a funeral for a Russian Jew who had served as deputy commander of a Russian paratrooper military camp during the war.

When Rabbi Rozwaski first arrived in Berlin, the major issue under debate was whether it was still important to remember the Holocaust or whether it was time for the new generation of Germans to move on, he said.

Ten years later, the Holocaust has not been forgotten in Germany – a new Holocaust memorial was recently built by the German government – but anti-Semitism in Germany and across Europe is on the increase, he said.

He attributed the substantial growth in anti-Semitism in Europe to a process he referred to as a "de-Europeanization" of Europe. With the growth of the European Union, Europeans are losing their sense of nationality, he said.

Then there is the tremendous growth in the number of Muslims immigrating to Europe, a large population in many European countries that refuses to assimilate or integrate and become Swedish or Dutch or French or German.

"The growing Muslim population is changing Europe," Rabbi Rozwaski said. "They have also brought with them a new anti-Semitism, which is finding fertile ground on the left and the right in Europe. This presents a serious problem, not only for the Jewish people and Israel but also for the entire world."

He noted that Germany is currently Israel's best friend in Europe. There are four times as many Israeli-owned businesses in Germany now than there were when he arrived.

"The German government stands by the Jewish community and Israel politically, financially and socially," he said. "But who knows how long that will last. The German government doesn't control public opinion. I receive a lot of hate letters and am on a 'threatened persons' list. This is a time not unlike the 1930s. Everything is in a state of flux and the Jews are at the centre of it.

"We have to trust in God that He will continue to take care of us."

JGH on alert for swine flu

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The Jewish General Hospital (JGH) elevated its level of emergency preparedness, following the confirmation of swine flu cases in Canada.

The hospital is taking various precautions to keep patients, visitors and staff safe and well informed.

Hospital staff have been told to be particularly vigilant for symptoms among patients and visitors. Stations in certain clinical areas of the hospital are also screening people who have recently arrived from areas affected by flu and are exhibiting the respiratory symptoms associated with it.

Instructions to patients and visitors have been posted throughout the hospital, displayed on the hospital website and listed on a telephone hotline.

"Safety is a top priority at the JGH," said executive director Dr. Hartley Stern. "Coordinated teams throughout the hospital are taking all necessary measures to ensure that patients, visitors and employees have the guidance, support and tools to protect their health – not only when heightened vigilance is required, but at all times.

"The JGH recognizes the paramount importance of a clean and safe environment, having previously launched a cleanliness campaign that has boosted staff by 10 full-time housekeeping positions on weekdays and 11 part-time positions during the weekend. These efforts have been further enhanced by an extensive hand hygiene program."

The JGH is advising anyone who has been to the areas affected by the flu or been in contact with someone who recently returned from those areas, or has fever, cough, shortness of breath, severe headaches or muscle pain to go immediately to the nearest emergency department. Updated information is being posted on the website at www.jgh.ca.

Winnipeg Jewish seniors centre loses major funder

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — As if facing a $25,000 deficit for its kosher meals-on-wheels program wasn't enough in the way of tzuris, the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre has just been dealt another financial body blow.

On April 7, the day before Pesach, the Gwen Secter's executive director, Marilyn Regiec, received a letter from the north Winnipeg Jewish senior centre's major funder, the National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW), Winnipeg section, notifying her that as of June 1, it will no longer pay for the bulk of the centre's operating costs.

"Our operating costs for our building [utilities and taxes] come to $50,000 a year," Regiec said. "The National Council has always paid 80 per cent of those costs. Their withdrawal of support means that we have to find as much as $40,000 more a year to replace their contributions."

The NCJW has been supporting Jewish seniors programs in Winnipeg since 1949. Gwen Secter's was one of the first seniors drop-in programs in Canada, said Diane Glass, speaking for NCJW Winnipeg.

"We have done a lot over the years," said Glass, who is also NCJW national president. "We [the Winnipeg section] bought and renovated the current building [with the help of private donors such as the Secter family and the estate of Hinda and George Gratz] primarily as a centre for seniors programs."

Glass said NCJW, which maintains its own office in the Gwen Secter building, never intended to be the principal funder for the building in perpetuity. "We have invested $800,000 in this building over the last 20 years," she said.

"It has used up 95 per cent of the money we have raised over that time. We haven't been able to afford to fund any other projects. And now we can no longer afford to support the Gwen Secter at the rate that we have in the past."

The decision to substantially reduce funding for the Gwen Secter Centre is a reflection of the financial difficulties being faced by the NCJW's Winnipeg section. The organization's primary sources of income for the past few years have been membership dues and its second-hand store, Just a Second.

Laura Richman, the longtime store chair, reports that sales were slower than usual at the store this past winter.

"Our store sales always drop after Christmas," she said. "It was worse this year, in part because of the longer winter and also because we let our charitable status lapse last fall. [She added that its charitable status would be reinstated by the end of May.] Because we were unable to issue charitable receipts, some people who might have made donations in household goods to the store may have held off until we regained our charitable number."

Richman added that the store's business is picking up now.

NCJW membership also isn't what it once was. Richman recalls that when she was president of the Winnipeg region in the mid-1980s, National Council had 600 members in Winnipeg. Now membership is just over 300, with two local chapters still operating. As is the case for most service organizations, NCJW is having difficulty attracting younger women.

"Younger women [and men] are more focused on their careers and families," Richman said.

"We had a financial cushion, but it's gone now," she added.

Glass said that National Council is still committed to contributing $5,000 a year to the building's operating expenses, but she added that the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and the community as a whole should fund the Gwen Secter Centre.

Regiec and some of Gwen Secter's board members; Glass; Bob Freedman, federation's executive director; Faye Rosenberg-Cohen, federation's planning co-ordinator, and several community business leaders and philanthropists met on April 20.

"We have been aware for several years that this day would come," Freedman said. "Now that National Council is no longer able to act as the principal funder, we have to come up with other solutions."

However, he said that there is no need to panic. "The Gwen Secter is a very important institution in our community. I am confident that we will come up with a solution."

For the short term, Regiec has put out calls to the centre's 300 members, asking them to contribute $200 each, or whatever they feel they can afford, to help cover costs. Membership currently is $40 per person annually.

Regiec is also approaching the provincial government to see what funding may be available for seniors programs.

However, help from federation will take a while.

Glass, who is a former vice-president of the federation's budget and allocations committee, said that the committee is just beginning to determine its allocations for the year. The money doesn't start flowing until September, she said.

She said she is confident that a solution will be found that will keep the Gwen Secter Centre operating in the black for years to come.

Richman also said she is confident that the community will come to Gwen Secter's aid. "The centre is a very important asset in our community."

'Anti-Semitic' play make Canadian debut

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec Jewish Congress (QJC) has denounced a short play that is to be presented in Montreal in the strongest terms, calling it anti-Semitic and hateful.

Seven Jewish Children: A Play for Gaza by English dramatist Caryl Churchill is scheduled to make its Canadian debut in English and French on May 3 at the Espace Geordie, under the sponsorship of Independent Jewish Voices Montreal (IJVM), a group that is critical of Israel's presence in the Palestinian territories and treatment of the Palestinians.

"QJC is very disappointed that the play is being staged here," said incoming president Adam Atlas. "We think it is anti-Semitic and full of hatred… It culminates with a depiction of Jews as ghoulish, bloodthirsty and heartless killers.

"On top of that, there is the implication that Jews have a long history of lying to and indoctrinating their children, which is shocking."

As the son of a Holocaust survivor, Atlas said he is personally offended by the play's early scenes in which a parent or other adult relative is apparently preparing a young girl to leave Europe for a new life in Israel. "Tell her, of course tell her, tell her everyone was driven out and the country is waiting for us to come home… Don't tell her who used to live in this house… don't tell her Arabs used to sleep in her bedroom."

The play unfolds entirely as if a Jewish adult is equivocating between what to tell a child about the Jewish presence in Israel and relations with Arabs in order not to frighten them. That desire to protect the young descends into a frantic effort to whitewash what is too unpalatable even for the grown-up to face head on.

The play, whose script is readily available on the Internet, depicts Jews who emigrated to Israel as self-righteous and with a strong sense of entitlement to the land. They have a condescending, dismissive attitude toward Arabs.

As the scenes reach into modern times, Israelis are depicted as repressive and brutal, but still claiming the moral high ground.

By the end, there are inflammatory lines such as, "Tell her they want their children killed to make people sorry for them… Tell her we're the iron fist now, tell her it's the fog of war, tell her we won't stop killing them till we're safe… Tell her they're animals living in rubble now, tell her I wouldn't care if we wiped them out."

The play culminates with "[T]ell her we're the chosen people, tell her I look at one of their children covered in blood and what do I feel? Tell her all I feel is happy it's not her."

Atlas thinks the play trivializes the Holocaust and amounts to Holocaust revisionism "by its not-so-subtle" parallel between the Jewish tragedy and Israel's military action in Gaza this past winter.

He is concerned the play will only reinforce the views of those who already do not like Jews. The fact that Seven Jewish Children is being presented by a Jewish group does not mean that it can't be described as anti-Semitic, he said.

QJC, however, is making no attempt to block the production here, nor has it contacted the IJVM to express its disapproval.

Seven Jewish Children, which runs about 10 minutes, had its premiere in February at London's Royal Court Theatre, amid considerable controversy. The Board of Deputies of British Jews accused Churchill of being "anti-Israel," while the Zionist Federation of Great Britain and Ireland termed it "a modern blood libel."

Sixty well-known British Jews published a letter in the Daily Telegraph saying the play reinforces "false stereotypes" about Jews.

Churchill, 71, who lived with her family in Montreal for a while after World War II, attending the private Trafalgar School, is associated with the Palestinian Solidarity Campaign.

The play was mounted in March at the Washington, D.C., Jewish Community Centre, but only after Ari Roth, artistic director of its Theatre J, had to defend his decision to opponents in the community. He also modified the program by adding two pro-Israel plays and a panel discussion.

The Montreal production is directed by Rose Plotek, who teaches drama at York University's Glendon College. There is an intention to bring Seven Jewish Children to Toronto at some point.

Devora Neumark, speaking for IJVM, doesn't deny the play is "difficult," but she rejects labelling it anti-Semitic. "As the mother of two children, I know how challenging it is to know what to tell and not tell them. This play is about how we pass information on to the next generation.

"It also is asking us as a society to talk about difficult questions. Art is there to push buttons and boundaries. This play promotes a dialogue in which we can investigate our ethics."

Neumark said she wouldn't hesitate to bring her 16-year-old daughter, but that's because she has visited Israel and the Palestinian territories with her mother and has an understanding of the situation.

The staged reading at Espace Geordie will be followed by a discussion period. The event is co-sponsored by Teesri Duniya Theatre, which in 2007 presented My Name is Rachel Corrie, which critics viewed as one-sided Israel-bashing. Other sponsors include Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights and Medical Aid for Palestine. Entry is free, but a collection will be taken for the latter organization's work in Gaza.

PREMIER PERFORMANCE: Grade 4, 5 and 6 members of the Bialik Hebrew Day School Choir performed, by special invitation, at a recent ceremony at Queen's Park. The event was organized by the Yad Vashem Society to honour a group of Holocaust survivors. Premier Dalton McGuinty, centre, was in attendance and shook hands with all the Bialik students.

Michael Oren tapped as Israel's envoy to U.S.

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A university professor who advocates for Israel to unilaterally withdraw from the West Bank is set to be appointed the country's next ambassador to Washington.

Michael Oren, who is Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's candidate for the position, received Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman's endorsement after separate meetings with Netanyahu and Lieberman.

The approval of the candidacy by the cabinet Sunday was considered a formality. Oren would then take up the position before Netanyahu's expected meeting with U.S. President Barack Obama in Washington on May 18 or 19.

Oren, a dual U.S.-Israel citizen who currently is a visiting professor at Georgetown University in Washington, has earned plaudits for his extensive scholarship on the 1967 Six Day War.

In a recent lecture at Georgetown University, he said, "The only alternative for Israel to save itself as a Jewish state is by unilaterally withdrawing from the West Bank and evacuating most of the settlements."

Netanyahu has resisted calls for a West Bank pullback, warning that Palestinian extremists could take over and endanger Israel.

He emerged over several high-profile candidates for the position, including ex-Likud MK Zalman Shoval, who served twice before as ambassador to the United States; Dore Gold, who served as Israel's ambassador to the United Nations from 1997 to 1999, and Alon Pinkas, who served as consul general in New York from 2000 to 2004.

Oren received a PhD in Near East studies from Princeton University in 1986. He has lectured as a visiting professor at several leading American universities, including Harvard and Yale.

Michael Oren

During Israel's January offensive against Palestinian militants in Gaza, Oren volunteered as a military liaison officer, briefing reporters outside Gaza.

Oren has written several books, including a 2002 study of the 1967 Six-Day War, in which Israel captured the West Bank, Gaza Strip, Golan Heights and Sinai desert, and a 2007 view of U.S. policy in the Middle East from 1776 to the present era, called Power, Faith and Fantasy.

In an analysis last year, Oren wrote that an Obama administration was likelier to clash with Israel on certain policies than one led by Senator John McCain, then the Republican candidate. Some critics of Israel in recent weeks have depicted the analysis as an attack on Obama, but Oren's defenders say it was a dispassionate and scholarly assessment of how each candidate's stated policies would play out.

Unlike other postings, made at the discretion of the foreign minister, the Washington envoy is usually chosen by the prime minister because of the sensitivity of the post. Oren would replace Sallai Meridor, who was known to be close to Netanyahu's predecessor, Ehud Olmert.

Iranian candidate wanted in attack on Argentine Jews

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A candidate for president in the upcoming Iranian presidential elections is wanted by Interpol in the 1994 bombing of a Jewish centre in Argentina.

Mohsen Rezaei, who is wanted by Interpol in the bombing of the Jewish centre, is one of five candidates in the race.

Rezaei, speaking to reporters in Tehran last Sunday, said that if elected he would be willing to co-operate with the United States on regional security matters.

He also criticized hardline Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for his handling of the faltering economy and said his questioning of the Holocaust "has no benefit."

He made no mention, however, of the Argentine bombing case, which he has never discussed publicly.

Rezaei, who led Iran's Revolutionary Guards during the country's war with Iraq in the 1980s, is on a list of five Iranian officials sought by Interpol since 2007 for the Buenos Aires bombing that killed 85 people. Iran has rejected any link to the bombing.

He is not considered a strong challenger to Ahmadinejad in the June 12 vote. But if elected, Iran would have a leader who could be shunned by other nations and whose travel would likely be limited due to Interpol's decision to add him to its most-wanted list.

Rezaei is positioning himself as a candidate aiming to reverse what he calls Ahmadinejad's harmful foreign policy.

On Sunday, he addressed the Obama administration's efforts to engage Iran, saying his country should respond and test whether Washington is serious.

"We are ready to have interactions with foreign countries on preserving security, peace and tranquillity in the region," he said.

Rezaei said Iran should not wait for the U.S. to make the first move. He also hinted at a willingness to co-operate with the U.S. in Afghanistan, as Iran did before former U.S. president George W. Bush labelled the country part of an axis of evil.

LIVE, WORK AND SIGNIFICANTLY CONTRIBUTE TO JEWISH LIFE IN BEAUTIFUL WEST VANCOUVER.

Executive Director Congregation Har El

HAR EL

Congregation Har El, encompassing the North Shore Jewish Community Centre and the Har El Synagogue exists to help build community, strengthen family life, and promote Jewish identity in Vancouver's North Shore and surrounding communities. Located in beautiful West Vancouver, the organization is at a pivotal point: the facility is world-class, the congregation consists of a growing number of young families, the volunteer base is highly committed and professional, the Rabbi is thoroughly well-liked and effective, and a comprehensive strategic planning process has been undertaken with a clear vision for the future. With over 500 individual members from 20 nationalities, Congregation Har El provides quality experiences through a mix of formal and informal Jewish educational, recreational and cultural activities.

There now exists an exceptional opportunity for a well-rounded leader with significant director-level experience to play a material role in operationalising the organization's vision for its future. Reporting to the Board of Directors, the Executive Director will provide essential strategic, fiscal and operational leadership to all facets of Har El's operations. This includes Finance, Communications, Public Relations, Administration, Human Resources, Member Services, Fundraising, and Facilities Management. Visible in all aspects of synagogue life, the incumbent is responsible for the organization's consistent achievement of its mission and financial objectives.

This role will require an ambitious, strategic thinker who can lead and motivate a medium-sized congregation, build relationships, prioritize projects, manage a budget, and ensure that the large diverse member base feels that their interests are being understood, met, and respected. Equipped with strong leadership skills and thorough administrative and accounting knowledge, the Executive Director will be a team player with the ability to consider the big picture, but is also willing to jump in and work on everyday details.

To explore this exciting opportunity further, please contact Nathalie Garthside, Kathryn Young or Ken Werker in our Vancouver office at 604-685-0261 or to be considered for this position, please submit your resume and related information online at: www.rayberndtson.ca/en/careers/8475

Government moves to dismiss AIPAC case

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — Prosecutors asked a judge to drop charges against two former AIPAC staffers accused of passing along classified information.

In a May 1 statement, the acting U.S. attorney in the eastern district of Virginia said restrictions on the government's case imposed by Judge T.S. Ellis III made conviction unlikely.

"Given the diminished likelihood the government will prevail at trial under the additional intent requirements imposed by the court and the inevitable disclosure of classified information that would occur at any trial in this matter, we have asked the court to dismiss the indictment," Dana Boente said.

The motion all but guarantees a dismissal.

"Intent requirements" refers to an earlier Ellis ruling that the government must prove that Keith Weissman, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee's former Iran analyst, and Steve Rosen, its former foreign policy chief, intended not only to assist Israel but to harm the United States.

Weissman and Rosen were charged under a rarely used section of the 1917 Espionage Act that makes it a crime for civilians to receive and distribute closely held defence information. Both men were later dismissed by AIPAC, with the organization claiming the two had violated its rules. Rosen has filed a multimillion dollar lawsuit against AIPAC.

Lawrence Franklin, a former mid-level Iran analyst at the Pentagon, admitted to leaking information to Rosen and Weissman in 2003 because he wanted his concerns about the Iranian threat to reach the White House.

His Pentagon colleagues were focused on Iraq, and Franklin believed AIPAC could get his theories a hearing at the White House's National Security Council. He also leaked information to Naor Gilon, the former chief political officer at the Israeli Embassy.

By the summer of 2004, government agents co-opted Franklin into setting up Rosen and Weissman. He allegedly leaked classified information to Weissman about purported Iranian plans to kill Israeli and U.S. agents in northern Iraq.

Weissman and Rosen allegedly relayed that information to AIPAC colleagues, the media and Gilon. AIPAC fired the two men in March 2005.

Franklin was sentenced in January 2006 to nearly 13 years in jail.

Reached by phone, Rosen told JTA he was "ecstatic" and was "still absorbing a life-changing moment." He said he had been on the phone Friday morning nonstop with family and friends.

"There was a great injustice here, but thank God we live in a country where the courts can correct this kind of injustice," he said.

For the immediate future, Rosen said, he would focus on a book he is writing on government leaks.

Baruch Weiss, Weissman's lawyer, told JTA that the decision is a "great victory for the First Amendment and for the pro-Israel community." Anything the defendants did "was to the benefit of Israel and the United States," he said.

The dropping of the case came just before the start of AIPAC's annual policy conference in Washington on May 3.

Spain approves Israeli bombing probe

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Spanish National Court judge Fernando Andreu announced Monday that he will pursue his investigation into a 2002 Israeli bombing in the Gaza Strip, despite contrary advice by prosecutors at the court.

Meanwhile, Defence Minister Ehud Barak said he would call on the Spanish government to prevent the investigation, reiterating Israel's stance that the Israel Defence Forces is the most "moral" army in the world.

"I intend to appeal to the Spanish foreign minister, the Spanish minister of defence and, if need be, the Spanish prime minister, who is a colleague of mine in the Socialist International, to override the decision," said Barak.

"No army is as moral as the Israel Defence Forces, and I have no doubt that the people who were involved in eliminating [alleged Hamas member Salah] Shehadeh acted with a clear mind and towards a single goal – to protect the citizens of Israel."

Six senior IDF officers and security officials are the subject of investigation over their involvement in the 2002 bombing in densely populated Gaza City. That attack, using a one-ton bomb dropped from an Israeli F-16, targeted and allegedly killed Shehadeh along with 14 other people.

Andreu said the 2002 bombing might constitute a crime against humanity. The suspects named by Andreu include former defence minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, former IDF chief of staff Dan Halutz and five current or former army officers or security officials.

On Monday, the Spanish judge wrote that Israel's military conducted an internal investigation, but Israeli military and civilian prosecutors declined to open proceedings of their own. He said for this reason Spain has jurisdiction to keep investigating.

"In Israel, there has not been, nor is there now underway, any legal proceedings aimed at investigating the Gaza bombing," the judge wrote.

The National Court has become known for its inquiries into alleged human rights abuses in other countries, including Chile, Argentina and Tibet, as well as the western Sahara.

Andreu's initial decision to investigate infuriated the Israeli government. Spanish Foreign Minister Miguel Angel Moratinos said in response that Spain planned to modify its law to narrow the scope of universal jurisdiction cases to those with a clear link to Spain.

Iran refuses to hand over the suspects

Argentine prosecutors allege that senior Iranian officials orchestrated the bombing and entrusted the Lebanon-based militant group Hezbollah to carry it out.

A van packed with explosives blew up on July 18, 1994, levelling the seven-story Jewish centre. It killed 85 people and wounded 200. No one has been brought to justice in the attack.

In 2007, Interpol issued special notices for the five Iranians, the equivalent of putting them on its most-wanted list. The notices cannot force countries to arrest or extradite suspects, but can put government leaders on the spot and limit suspects' travel.

Iran has refused to hand over the suspects and has rejected the allegations, calling them political fabrications resulting from U.S. and Israeli pressure.

Besides Rezaei, the other suspects wanted by Interpol are former intelligence chief Ali Fallahian; Mohsen Rabbani, former cultural attaché at Iran's embassy in Buenos Aires; Ahmad Reza Asghari, a former diplomat; and Ahmad Vahidi, a Revolutionary Guards general.

Hezbollah militant Imad Mughniyeh, once one of the world's most sought terrorism suspects, was also named in the Interpol notices. He was killed in a car bombing in Syria in 2008 that Hezbollah blamed Israel for. Israel denied it.

Despite some support in his home region in the oil-rich province of Khuzestan in southwestern Iran and among Iran-Iraq war veterans, the 57-year-old Rezaei is not considered likely to win in June.

Israel Briefs

Israel warns EU

Israel warned the European Union to tone down the criticism of its new government or be cut out of the Middle East peace process. The warning came prior to the meeting this week between Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman and the head of the EU rotating presidency during a visit to the Czech Republic. The EU's commissioner said that her organization would freeze a planned upgrade of relations with Israel until the government commits to peace talks with the Palestinians.

Israel not on airline map

Israeli passengers complained to a British airline after Israel was not included on the in-flight map. The BMI airline runs two low-cost flights from London to Tel Aviv daily and also flies to countries such as Syria, Lebanon and Iran. The airline said the map, which showed the distance to Mecca and other Muslim holy sites, and identified Haifa as Khefa – the Arab name for the city before 1948 – was tailored to passengers destined for Arab countries. The two planes bound for Israel that featured the controversial maps originally had been scheduled to fly to an Arab country, according to reports. A company statement called the showing of the map on a flight to Tel Aviv a "logistic failure" and said the map will be removed from planes flying to Israel.

Turkey ends investigation

Turkey has closed an investigation into war crimes allegedly committed by Israel during its Gaza offensive earlier this year, the Anatolia news agency reported. According to the report, the probe was the result of an initiative by an Islamist human rights group, Mazlum-Der. Relations between Jerusalem and Ankara, which both governments view as strategically crucial, have been strained by the Gaza war and the discontinuation of Turkish-mediated peace talks between Israel and Syria.

Police question Lieberman

Israeli police questioned Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman for the fourth time. The questioning, part of a corruption probe against him, lasted for eight hours. Police have said they believe they have enough evidence to charge Lieberman, who heads the Yisrael Beiteinu party, with money laundering, fraud and breach of trust. Police will hand their findings to prosecutors soon. Meanwhile, Lieberman was named to Time Magazine's list of the world's 100 most influential people in 2009. Lieberman appears in the "Leaders and Revolutionaries" category.

IDF attacks tunnels

Israeli Air Force aircraft on Friday bombed two smuggling tunnels along Egypt's border with the Gaza Strip, in response to a Qassam fired from the coastal territory the previous day that hit the western Negev. The rocket, which struck an open field, was the first to hit the Negev after a period of relative calm. No injuries or damages were reported in the Qassam strike.

Bibi makes Schalit vow

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu vowed that Israel will do all it can to bring home kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit. Speaking at the annual Independence Day reception at the president's residence for past and present Israeli army commanders, Netanyahu said "we are committed to bringing Gilad Schalit home in one piece to his parents. Every combat soldier knows that we will do all within our power to bring him home alive and well." Schalit was abducted by Hamas in June 2006.

Hijacker released

Youssef Magied al-Molqui, the Palestinian man who led the hijacking of the Achille Lauro cruise ship was released from an Italian prison last Wednesday and ordered to leave Italy. He was released early for good behaviour after serving 24 years of a 30-year sentence. Palestinian guerrillas hijacked the Achille Lauro in 1985. The four hijackers shot and killed Leon Klinghoffer, an elderly American Jewish man who was in a wheelchair, and threw his body overboard.

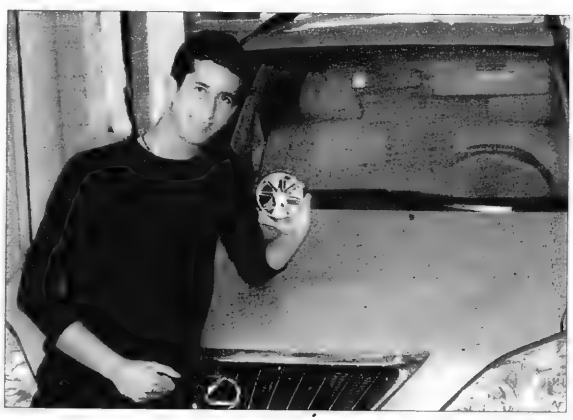
Israeli whiz kid's invention lowers gas consumption

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Israel21c



Inventor Zion Badash

TEL AVIV — If you could spend $208 (US) on a small device for your car engine that lowers gas consumption up to 40 per cent, reduces pollution and gives your car more power, you might think that it sounds too good to be true.

Well, this is what the Z5, invented by Israeli teenager Zion Badash when he was 16, promises to do.

An air filter, the Z5 is fitted onto the the car's engine. It changes – for a fraction of a second – the way air behaves when going into the combustion chamber. This change allows the engine to use air more efficiently, saving fuel and giving more thrust at the same time.

After working on it for two years, Badash started selling the Z5 a few months ago. Car manufacturers around the world are lining up for stakes in the new device.

Badash came up with the idea for the Z5 while he was walking down a smoggy street in Tel Aviv one day and noticed the pollution belching out of the cars. "That bothered me," he said. He didn't have a driver's licence and had no idea about fuel costs. It was the environmental cost of pollution that put his gears in motion.

"Especially being a young kid, I had no idea what was the cost of gas or the fuel consumption for regular cars," said Badash, now 18. "I realized if [the solution] comes before the combustion itself, the effect will not only be on emissions – it will also affect emissions, save fuel and make the car more powerful," he said.

Of course, more energy saving is "a big and important effect," he added, but it "wasn't my main concern."

Badash, who studied physics in high school and is taking math at university, is about to be recruited into the army.

After developing the prototype of the Z5, he went on to found a three-person company. It's a family business run by his brother-in-law, Eli Mor, with headquarters in Tel Aviv and a manufacturing and distribution outlet in Turkey.

The Z5 is now available through mail order via the company's website, and thousands of units have been sold so far.

The world's large car manufacturers have been in touch with Mor, Badash told ISRAEL21c. They are looking for ways it can be fitted directly into their vehicles.

"Ford, Mazda, all the large companies have been in contact with us, and we are in talks with them," says Mor, who sees the environment as the main priority for the business. "This is the top of the work. We don't look at fluctuating gas prices."

Road tests on emissions show that his invention does work, Badash said. It can be fitted onto new cars, or old ones, diesel, hybrid, buses – basically any combustion engine, even power plants, he added.

"Using it in an open combustion chamber brings a maximum effect. You can see fuel consumption [go down] very clearly. It can be used everywhere."

Filmmaker considers taking a break from Israel

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

By his own admission, Igal Hecht is burned out.

The Toronto filmmaker behind such documentaries as Not in my Name, Disengaging Democracy, Shield of Solomon and My Flag has done 28 films about Israel or Judaism in the last seven years.

"I'm tapped out," he says. "It's time to do something else. I think. I've run out of ideas."

Also, he says, the current economic climate doesn't help. "It's tough to get funding. Right now, especially, it's like a drought."

From October 2007 to December 2008, Hecht figures he's made 14 films in Israel, flying to Israel every six weeks.

"That's an insane amount – it works out to one film a month," he says. "I wouldn't have been able to do it without Lior Cohen [a filmmaker he works with in Israel]. You need someone as persistent as yourself."

It was after filming My Flag, which screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival last month, that Hecht started to consider taking a break.

In the documentary, Hecht embarked on a journey across Israel to discover what the country's flag means to Israelis. The Israeli carefree, and at times hateful, attitude toward the flag visibly angered him. In one scene Hecht, wearing an Israeli flag around him, is seen being harassed by anti-Zionist religious Jews in the Mea Shearim neighbourhood of Jerusalem.

"The flag means so much to me. I wanted to do the film because I feel passionate about Israel. I loved making the film, but I got the impression that Israelis don't know what is happening in their country. I came back from there and said to myself, 'I need a break from that place'"

Even though Hecht may stop making Israeli documentaries for the time being, he hasn't lost any of his passion. Once we start talking about politics, the Israeli-born filmmaker gets on a roll.

"There's a lack of leadership and vision in Israel. Leaders are borderline – not even borderline – they are corrupt. I realize as I sit here in the Diaspora passing judgment that I sound like a hypocrite, but I think it's fair to point this out."

He says with so many Knesset members being investigated for sex scandals, fraud, etc., Israelis feel they can do what they want.

"It's like chaos there right now. You get the sense people don't know where they're going. Leaders change their minds every five minutes. There's a lack of vision – a lack of inspired leadership."

Hecht is also stressed out by the reaction to his films. He's been accused of being both too left and too right wing. Recently, CTV Television refused to run one of his latest films, 35 Acres, because, he said, the slant it takes wasn't what they wanted. "They said it was too right wing," Hecht says.

35 Acres follows three right-wing Jewish extremists who try to gain access to the Temple Mount and destroy the Al Asqa Mosque. He films them being harassed by security forces and searched. Hecht says the film didn't sympathize with them but does ask a valid question: Is it right for people to be banned from going somewhere because they're Jewish?

Hecht said he doesn't like to be pigeonholed. "My politics change with the topic that I'm filming. I've got a soft spot for the southern part of Israel [like Sderot for instance]. People think I'm a right winger, but those people are overlooked. I really get angry and want to champion their cause."

But then, he says, when you go to the West Bank and see the checkpoints and the soldiers behaving rudely, your sympathies switch to the other side "It's hard to say if I'm this or that. It's hard to be dogmatic. I try to maintain a balance."

Through his company, Chutzpa Productions, Hecht still has several films coming down the pipeline, including Shunned, a film about gay Palestinians airing on Out TV on June 14.

Filmmaker Igal Hecht appears burned out after filming a scene overlooking Jerusalem.

He's also finished work on Theatre of Conflict, a seven-year look at the Jewish-Arab conflict at York University. He started the project when he was a student. "They still have the same chants they did seven years ago when I was a student. It's always the same thing."

He's also finishing the third instalment of a trilogy on the messianic movement in Israel, a sequel to The Chosen People and In The Shadow of the Messiah.

His first non-Israeli project took him to Cambodia recently to film Beer Girls, a look at women's rights in Cambodia. "It was amazing to film there," he says. The film shows how beer companies exploit the female workforce.

Meanwhile, sometime in May he hopes to have chutzpafilms.com running. The website will showcase all the films made by Chutzpa Productions, including 35 Acres.

"I'm putting them online and, following the iTunes model, people can stream them for 99 cents each. There will be a variety of films. I hope it generates enough to fund my next movie."

What that is, he's not sure yet, though he's got a couple ideas in mind. He's buoyed by the fact that one of his documentaries, Shield of Solomon, chronicling the struggles of Sudanese refugees in Israel, was aired on CBC.

"It was my most successful film. The CBC Documentary Channel is the Canadian mecca for documentaries – it was a pinnacle for me. I've tried to get a film on there for years."

He also says he's dying to project a different side of Israel, one that the majority of filmmakers ignore. When filming My Flag, for instance, he came across a group of people who go deep in the forest and sing Israeli folk songs around bonfires.

"That's the image of Israel I want people to have. Israel is a very safe place. Most filmmakers concentrate only on the bad.

"I don't need every film I make to be controversial," but, he adds, "I think I have some controversy in me left."

For more information about Chutzpa productions, visit www.chutzpaproductions.com.

Clarification

The article "Inside Hana's Suitcase director brings a message of hope" (CJN, April 23) should have made clear that Fumiko Ishioka and George and Lara Brady use the Holocaust story about Hana's suitcase to teach adults and children about accepting others' differences, standing up for people who are singled out and about ways to make a peaceful world. Their focus is not religious tolerance or Holocaust education.

Adoration explores the nature of terrorism and martyrdom

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In his 12th feature film, Adoration, Canadian director Atom Egoyan veers off into the harsh terrain of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Scheduled to open in Toronto on May 8, Adoration is Egoyan's first overtly political movie since Ararat, which turned on the 1915 Armenian genocide.

Adoration is based on a terrorist incident in April 1986 in which a Jordanian national of Palestinian origin, Nizar Hindawi, attempted to plant Semtex plastic explosives aboard an El Al plane en route from London to Tel Aviv.

Rachel (Rachel Blanchard) and Sami (Noam Jenkins) in their bedroom.

Hindawi, who had ties with Syria's intelligence services, placed the bomb in the handbag of one of the passengers, Ann-Marie Murphy, his pregnant Irish girlfriend.

A simple, apolitical person, she had no idea that she was cynically being used as a pawn in a deadly struggle. If Murphy had made it past security guards, Hindawi would have detonated the bomb, killing some 400 people.

This is Egoyan's point of departure. In a series of scenes that frame Adoration, the Irish woman, known here as Rachel (Rachel Blanchard), faces an Israeli guard as she tries to board flight 016. In a thick Israeli accent, he asks her a number of routine questions. Her answers set off alarm bells, and she is not permitted to get on the aircraft.

Fast forwarding, Egoyan focuses on Sabine (Arsinee Khanjian), a tormented Toronto high school French teacher from Lebanon who gives her students a translation exercise on the Hindawi affair.

Much to Sabine's consternation, the assignment has an unsettling effect on one student, Simon (Devon Bostick), an orphan who pretends to be the son of the Irish woman, and on her career.

Simon reads his essay in class and then posts it on the Internet. The reaction triggers an emotional debate on chat lines: is Hindawi a monster or a hero?

After a Holocaust survivor condemns Hindawi, a neo-Nazi praises him as a hero. Their respective opinions symbolize the gamut of views on this explosive issue.

At once dark and mysterious, and distinguished by understated performances, Adoration shifts between the terrorist incident and its unforeseen repercussions in Toronto two decades later.

Egoyan's film, which is typically opaque and detached, explores interlocking themes ranging from the complexities of convoluted relationships to the nature of terrorism, martyrdom, victimhood, western penetration of Muslim lands, Islamic extremism and modern technology.

In touching on these diverse but connected topics, Egoyan adopts a cool, neutral tone, refraining from declaring his own sympathies.

His neutrality may be disturbing to some viewers, but it heightens tensions and endows Adoration with a certain edge.

Juno Award-winning composer/arranger influenced by Africa

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Decades have elapsed since Juno Award winner Hennie Bekker lived in Zambia. Yet childhood memories of Africa have left an indelible impact on his musical sensibility.

As a boy growing up in the remote copper-mining outposts of Nkana and Mufulira, Bekker would run barefoot through the bush with his African friends, listening to the sounds of birds high in the trees and to the rustle of wild animals deep in the jungle

At sunset on some days, he would hear the haunting beat of African drummers communicating with each other from many kilometres away.

"This made a lasting impression on me," said Bekker, who immigrated to Canada in the late 1980s.

"The complex rhythms of the drums were sensational," he recalled. "I can still hear them in my head. They gave me an appetite for African music."

Such primal influences formed Bekker, a composer and arranger who has a phenomenal 45 albums to his credit.

Chief among them is the African Tapestries Collection, which consists of a box set of five CD albums: Temba, The Smoke That Thunders, Kusasa, Jabula and Amani.

Bekker won a 1997 Juno – presented by the Canadian Academy of Recording Artists and Sciences – for Astroplane, the best dance recording.

In addition, he has been a Juno Award nominee three times each in the best instrumental artist and best dance recording categories.

"Canada has been very good to me," said Bekker in an interview one recent afternoon.

On Thursday, May 28, at 8 p.m., he showcases his wares at a concert to be held at the Jane Mallett Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts.

Billed as "a journey through the majesty and mystery of the African continent," the show will underscore his ability to fuse ambient, New Age and world music.

Purely instrumental, Bekker's music lends itself to introspection. "You can sit back and shut your eyes to it," he said.

A pianist by trade, Bekker launched his career as a recording artist after leaving South Africa and settling in Canada in 1987.

In Johannesburg, his base from 1962 onward, Bekker was the musical director of a large record company.

He arranged and produced scores for a succession of television dramas and documentaries commissioned by the South African Broadcast Corp. He was also active in the local film industry, working with, among others, South African director Jamie Uys and American actor Anthony Quinn.

As well, Bekker composed theme music for commercials for Aquafresh and Colgate toothpaste, Barclay Bank credit cards, Brylcream brilliantine, Carling Black beer, Datsun automobiles, Hertz car rental, Dunlop tires, Bols brandy, Holiday Inn, Kodak cameras, Jhirmack shampoo, South African Airways, Lucky Strike cigarettes and Schweppes beverages.

Hennie Bekker

In Canada, he continued composing music for commercials, landing jobs from Burger King, Canon, Hyundai, Kraft, Sani Flush, Toshiba, Sensodyne, Stelco Steel, Toshiba and Ultra Slim Fast.

But in the main, he devoted himself to making recordings. Thanks to a lucky break, he met Dan Gibson, a Canadian filmmaker and naturalist who was looking for a composer familiar with the acoustics of nature.

Scouring stock libraries, Gibson chanced upon Bekker's name. It was a good fit. Bekker and Gibson collaborated on 14 Solitude albums, some of which were quite successful.

Harmony, Breaking Through the Mist and Pacific Suite won double platinum, platinum and gold awards, while Great Lakes Suite, The Classics, Algonquin Suite, Rocky Mountain Suite and Appalachian Mountain Suite cleaned up, too.

Bekker also achieved success with CDs like Spring Rain, Summer Breeze, Autumn Magic and Winter Reflections and with the Tranquility series.

Although these albums have been popular in countries as far away as Russia, Bekker has not always reaped the financial rewards of his creativity.

"The whole music scene is suffering from file sharing and downloading," he said. "I'm surprised something hasn't been done about it."

Bekker, 75, was born in Nkana, a town in Zambia's copper belt more than 200 kilometres north of the capital, Lusaka.

It was not uncommon to find Jewish families like the Bekkers in places like Nkana or Mufulira. "Most of the Jews were shopkeepers," he said.

When he was 10, his father, Hennie, a mining supervisor from South Africa, bought him a piano. Bekker was a self-taught pianist. "I never went to music school."

At the age of 11, the Bekkers moved to Zimbabwe, then known as Rhodesia. They settled down in Bulawayo, the country's second-largest city.

Bekker joined an itinerant band as a pianist, and the gig took him through Africa, including the Congo.

Eventually, he settled in South Africa, finding the musical scene in Zimbabwe too small and confining for his talents and ambition.

In Johannesburg, the country's cultural hub, Bekker established himself as a regular in fusion-jazz clubs, all the while tending to his day job as a record company musical director.

Ultimately, he tired of South Africa. He hoped to to stretch himself out musically and had grown weary of its stifling racial segregation apartheid system.

"It was getting me down. It was a situation that could not last," said Bekker, a soft-spoken man of few words. "I felt an answer had to be found to it in the form of a more democratic society."

In retrospect, he is surprised that South Africa's transition from apartheid to democracy was non-violent.

"For that I'm very thankful."

He left Johannesburg in the early 1980s, landing in London, where he composed and arranged for such figures as Freddie Cole, Magna Carta and Stanley Black.

Feeling the need yet again to reinvigorate himself, Bekker immigrated to Canada, where he and his family have been ever since.

He and his third wife, a South African from Johannesburg, feel quite at home in Toronto.

Though he is well past retirement age, Bekker has no immediate plans to retire.

"I enjoy working in my studio," he said, adding that he is currently in the throes of developing yet another album.

Tuesdays with Morrie stars Barney Miller actor Hal Linden

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Hal Linden

Hal Linden, best known to television audiences as the police captain Barney Miller in the 1975-82 sitcom of the same name, is starring as Morrie Schwartz in The Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company's production of Tuesdays with Morrie.

Tuesdays with Morrie is based on newspaper columnist Mitch Albom's conversations with his former professor, Morrie Schwartz, who was dying from amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS). Their tape-recorded conversations about life's lessons resulted in a New York Times bestseller. The initial purpose for publishing the conversations was to cover Schwartz's medical bills.

"Impending death is the norm of everybody's life," Linden, 78, says. "The way you live your life… that is the distinction, I think that is what the play is about."

Linden says that we are all dying; it is only a question of how much time we've got to think about it. "It is more immediate with him [Morrie]. It has to do with not your philosophy of death, but your philosophy of life, and how you spend the time until you do die. Which if I were a heavily philosophic man, I would start now…or maybe 20 years ago," he said with a chuckle.

Both Schwartz and Linden are Jewish. Linden, born Harold Lipshitz in New York City, grew up in a Yiddish-speaking household. Although he can't speak the language fluently, there are phrases he remembers from childhood. When Linden had a question regarding a Yiddish phrase in the script, he was pleased that a Yiddish speaker was brought in to explain what the phrase meant and how to pronounce it.

Linden has worked in Jewish theatre before, in two productions of Lessons for the West Coast Jewish Theatre in Los Angeles. "What makes it a Jewish theatre company is that it selects plays with Jewish themes. We do need a place to examine those themes and this company [The Harold Green Jewish Theatre] will hopefully fill that need," he said.

The theatrically-trained Broadway veteran won a Tony Award for his performance in The Rothschilds and loves every medium he works in. "The theatre is an actor's medium, opposed to films and television, which are directors' mediums. You get input in theatre that you may never get in film," he said.

"What I like most about the theatre is rehearsal because that is where you discover and where you make words into flesh. That's where you do your work… once the show opens, it's execution, but in rehearsal it's creation."

The L.A.-based actor said he's grateful to have been successful in the acting profession and feels it is a rare thing. "It is like being in college the rest of your life, because what you are doing is learning somebody else's life every day. That is the most broadening experience you can have… In order to play a character, you have to know the character. You get a much greater understanding of human behaviour from living everybody, rather than just talking about it."

Linden has been married for 51 years to wife Frances, a former actress, singer and dancer. When not acting, the thespian loves to golf. "I'm trying to go through all the golf courses in Toronto," said Linden. "I have performed in Toronto many times and I've played most of the golf courses here, but I've missed a few and I'm trying to rectify that oversight."

The play is directed by Ted Dykstra and co-stars Rick Roberts'as Mitch Albom.

Tuesday With Morrie runs May 8 to 30 at the Winter Garden Theatre, 189 Yonge St. For tickets, call Ticketmaster at 416-872-5555 or online at www.ticketmaster.ca.

Investment banker quits day job to climb Everest and world's other highest peaks

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It's a feat that few have attempted and fewer still have accomplished.

But 28-year-old Alex Iscoe quit his job as an investment banker at Goldman Sachs to be one of the 230 people who have climbed the Seven Summits – the highest mountains in each of the seven continents.

"I was working for three years in New York and two in Hong Kong for Goldman Sachs, and I resigned in April of last year," said Iscoe, who grew up in Toronto.

"Things in the industry were not very good at that time... It struck me as a good time to take some time out to accomplish personal goals that I always wanted to do and never had a chance to."

Iscoe said he began his expedition last summer by climbing Europe's highest peak, Mount Elbrus in Russia.

By December, he had reached the summit of Mount Aconcagua in Argentina, and a month later, he had climbed Mount Vinson Massif in Antarctica, the highest peak in the region.

Iscoe said that of the three peaks he's already reached, the climb in Antarctica took the longest because of the logistics.

"It's a five-hour flight, and they don't fly unless the weather is really great, because the plane is landing on an ice runway. If there is any cross wind, they can't land," he said.

Attempting the climb in January, which is summertime there, meant they enjoyed 24 hours of sunlight.

"At three o'clock in the morning, the sun was as high in the sky as you would expect it at noon."

When asked if he ever felt like he wanted to give up, he said, laughing, "Yeah, pretty much every day."

But what keeps Iscoe motivated to move on to Mount Everest in Nepal, Asia, Mount McKinley in Alaska, Mount Kosciuszko in mainland Australia and Mount Kilimanjaro in Tanzania, Africa, is, of course, to be one of a few people in history to complete the tour, but also to raise funds for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"I've been working with UJA Federation for years, serving underprivileged children, working with a group of friends in honour of a friend of ours who was killed in a car accident in university."

In honour of his late friend Jordan Propas, who died in 2001, Iscoe and his friends created the Jordan Propas Camp Scholarship Fund.

But the funds raised as a result of this initiative will go to the Ethiopian community in Bat Yam, Israel, to help them integrate into Israeli society through educational programs for school-aged children.

"I've always been very impressed with the professionalism and the work that is done at UJA, and it was a natural fit for me to go to them," he said.

Iscoe, who spoke to The CJN the day before he travelled to the base camp at Everest, said he's wanted to attempt Everest for about 10 years, but didn't have the opportunity to tackle it until now.

"Climbing is one of those things that you really need to have a combination of time and energy and resources. You need money to accomplish this. It is not an inexpensive endeavour, and it takes a lot of time out from your personal life," he said.

Iscoe added that it is a possibility that he'll return to investment banking after his tour, but finds humour in the interest people have in what he'll do when he's achieved his goal.

"The truth is, I haven't really thought about it. For the last [five] months, since I've known that I'd be attempting Everest, that has been the main thing on my mind. I haven't thought much past it. I'll have to start thinking about getting a job, as you can imagine sometime in late summer, but between now and then, I have a really high mountain to climb."

Iscoe, his guides and his team left for the base camp at Everest on March 25 and spent weeks training, getting acclimatized to the environment, preparing the camps and climbing the highest mountain in the world.

As of the end of April, according to the UJA Federation website, they had ascended nearly 22,000 feet of the 29,000-foot-high mountain.

All in all, Iscoe said he expects to be on Everest for a total of two months.

"The reason the climb takes so long is that you're trying to acclimatize to the drop of oxygen and the drop in the pressure in the atmosphere. As you're doing that acclimatization, you're really pushing your body to be able to work at a level that it is not used to working at, it is not comfortable working at," he explained.

"There are countless stories of people who try to push themselves too hard and then don't have the energy to get back down and the descent becomes the most dangerous part of the climb."

He said that although the remaining mountains on his tour are smaller than Everest, he is still motivated to complete all seven by the end of this year.

"It's certainly not a cakewalk. None of these mountains are a cakewalk."

To follow the progress of Iscoe's team, visit www.alpineascents.com/everest-cybercast.asp.

Alex Iscoe, who is on a mission to climb the seven highest peaks in each of the seven continents, is motivated by the desire to become one of just 230 people to accomplish the feat and to raise funds for UJA Federation.

Disraeli's ideas played into hands of anti-Semites

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Benjamin Disraeli (1804-188}), still the first and only British prime minister of Jewish ancestry, was not only a canny politician but a recognized man of letters whose novels were all the rage in his day.

Adam Kirsch's relatively concise but penetrating biography, Benjamin Disraeli (Random House), examines both facets of his extraordinary life.

Described by his rival, William Gladstone, as "diabolically clever," Disraeli achieved fame at the age of 21 with his first novel, Vivian Grey, whose theme of boundless ambition would haunt him.

Disraeli wrote 17 more novels. Coningsby and Sybil were bestsellers, while Alroy and Tancred promoted proto-Zionism in the mould of George Eliot's novel, Daniel Deronda.

Yet accomplished as he was in literature, Disraeli left his greatest impression on politics. He sat in Parliament as a member of Parliament for some 30 years and led the Conservative party to power.

Adam Kirsch

Opposed initially to universal suffrage, he won plaudits for the passage of the second Reform bill, which granted most male heads of households the right to vote.

But in his greatest achievement, forged in 1868, he rose to the position of prime minister. It was an office he would hold yet again from 1874 to 1880.

During this phase of his glittering career, he dazzled friends and disheartened foes by audaciously buying 44 per cent of the shares of the Suez Canal after securing a loan from the Rothschilds.

He accomplished this feat despite the objections of his own cabinet and without the consent of Parliament.

Basking in a glow of contentment, he told Queen Victoria, "It is just settled. You have it, madam."

Kirsch rates Disraeli's purchase of Suez Canal shares, a triumph of British colonialism in the Middle East, as possibly the most celebrated episode in his illustrious career.

He adds that most of the shares, nonetheless, remained in the hands of France, Britain's competitor in the scramble for imperial influence in the Middle East.

For Disraeli, as Kirsch succinctly observes, his Jewishness was both "the greatest obstacle to his ambition and its greatest engine."

Though his father, a historian, literary critic and descendant of Spanish Jews, had him baptized as a teenager, Disraeli was generally regarded as a Jew and thus an outsider in British society.

"And that meant that he had to turn his Jewishness from a handicap into a mystique," writes Kirsch, an American book critic.

"He had to convince the world, and himself, that Jews were a noble race with a glorious past and a great future. He had to turn anti-Semitic myths to his own account."

Equal to the task, Disraeli reinvented himself as one of the 19th century's "chief points of reference for thinking about Jews and Judaism."

When Disraeli was born, Britain was inhabited by 15,000 Jews. Having been expelled from Britain in the 13th century, Jews were permitted to return in the mid-17th century by Oliver Cromwell. Yet few British Christians had ever laid eyes on Jews.

Given their alien image, and plagued by the anti-Semitic notions of such renowned British authors as Chaucer, Marlowe and Shakespeare, Britons were supremely receptive to myths and stereotypes about Jews.

Disraeli's father, Isaac, was affected by this state of mind. Kirsch contends that Isaac – whose family settled in Britain in 1748 – was painfully ambivalent toward Judaism, while his mother, Sarah, was downright hostile to Jews.

Their son, Benjamin, could have shunned his Jewish background. Instead, he cleverly gloried in it. Disraeli remained a member of the Church of England, while maintaining that Judaism and Christianity were essentially one faith.

Realizing that he could never "pass" an an ordinary Christian, Disraeli developed a public persona that allowed him to be a Jew while enjoying the civic rights of a Christian.

An aristocrat at heart, he concocted an idealized and self-aggrandizing portrait of Jews, both in his novels and in his speeches.

"Disraeli's understanding of Jewishness was deeply distorted by his disconnection from the collective Jewish life of his time," Kirsch writes.

He adds, "But Disraeli's imagination of Jewishness did what he needed it to do. It gave him the confidence to compete with the best-born men of England. It gave him the dignity he sustained through the most wounding attacks."

Through a devious character named Sidonia, who appears in several of his novels, Disraeli created an image of the Jew that, while designed to uplift and dignify Jews, played into the hands of anti-Semites.

The archetypal wandering Jew, Sidonia was a figure of immense power who controlled and manipulated governments from behind the scenes.

"With a few slight changes, you could easily turn the Sidonia scenes in Conigsby and Tancred into an anti-Semitic tract to rival The Protocols of the Elders of Zion," Kirsch writes. "And, as a matter of fact, the most vicious anti-Semites… all reprised Disraeli's ideas, sometimes giving him explicit credit."

Karl Eugen Duehring, a major anti-Jewish theorist in Germany, subscribed to Sidonia's racial doctrine: "The Jews are to be defined solely on the basis of race, and not on the basis of religion."

Wilhelm Marr, who coined the enduring phrase anti-Semitism, gladly embraced Disraeli's suggestion that Jews secretly pulled the strings.

The British writer Houston Stewart Chamberlain, a hero in Nazi eyes, subscribed to Sidonia's belief that racial excellence is "a positive fact."

Adolf Hitler, well aware of their corrosive rantings, expropriated them into his racist canon.

Reflecting on Disraeli's unintended legacy, Kirsch writes: "By the end of [his] life, anti-Semitism had mutated into something much more virulent, based no longer on contempt but on fear and hatred. The myth of Jewish superiority, which Disraeli had advanced to counter the fact of social inferiority, now interacted with the paranoid suspicions of anti-Semites to disastrous effect."

More than a century after his death, one wonders what Disraeli would have said had he known that his ideas were cynically used to defame, marginalize and murder Jews, particularly during the Holocaust.

Kingston Frontenacs' centre suits up for Team Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Like other elite-level hockey players, Ethan Werek of the Kingston Frontenacs would rather have continued playing well into the spring rather than see his season come to an abrupt end.

So when the Frontenacs were eliminated from Ontario Hockey League playoff contention, Werek jumped at the opportunity to join Team Canada for the International Ice Hockey Federation's (IIHF) under-18 tournament in Fargo, N.D.

Suiting up with other Canadian Hockey League players who missed the playoffs, Werek scored four goals and added two assists in six games. Unfortunately, Canada dropped a 2-1 quarter-final match to the eventual gold medallist Americans and, in the bronze-medal game, lost to Finland 5-4 in a shootout.

Werek, who ended the season playing on an injured ankle, said "it was kind of disappointing" to come away without a medal, but the 18-year-old will likely have something to grin about soon.

His rookie season – in which he scored 32 goals and added 32 assists – has attracted the attention of National Hockey League scouts. The NHL's Central Scouting bureau has him pegged as an almost karmic 32nd pick among domestic skaters.

Werek plans to make the trek down the 401 to Montreal for the draft. "To soak in the experience will be amazing," he said.

At six-foot-two and 195 pounds, Werek brings a lot to the table for any NHL club, said Frontenacs assistant coach Darren Keily. "I think he has NHL potential for sure."

Werek did well as an OHL rookie, he has a good work ethic and is knowledgeable about the game. "He works hard, is tenacious and watches lots of video. He uses his size – he's a big kid. He wants the puck all the time. He's not afraid to go in the dirty areas [in front of the net] and score goals," Keily said.

Werek led the team in power-play goals, and though a centreman, he's stronger at scoring goals than setting them up, the coach said.

Coming from Tier II junior hockey meant he had to improve his defensive game, "and he did it… There really is no downside to his game," though he "needs to keep his feet moving and not take penalties," Keily said.

Playing with Team Canada, Werek was asked to score goals and be "an energy guy." But "I try to be an all-round player – energy, toughness, scoring touch," he said. "I'll do whatever I have to do to get the puck."

If you haven't seen him play, he suggests his style is closest to Philadelphia Flyers' Mike Richards – "a real good two-way centreman who's physical and is a leader."

Ethan Werek

One of the highlights of his OHL season came in a game versus London Knights, home of highly touted John Tavares. In front of 6,000 screaming London fans, Werek scored the winning goal with four seconds left on the clock. In another match against the Frontenacs' main rival, the Belleville Bulls, he scored the winner in overtime in the only game of eight against the Bulls won by Kingston.

The year before he joined the Frontenacs, he played for the Stouffville Spirit of the Ontario Provincial Junior Hockey Leage (OPJHL) – a junior A team his Israeli father owns – scoring 70 points in 37 games. Before that, he played minor hockey with the Toronto Marlies, and he once had an offer to play for the Israeli national junior team but turned it down so as not to jeopardize his eligibility to play for a Canadian team. He and his childhood buddy, Daniel Erlich, who plays for the Knights, did work out with the Israelis during one of the junior team's tours in Los Angeles.

While in Kingston, Werek has taken a couple of political science courses at Queen's University. It's something encouraged by his parents. "Hockey is only one part of life and school is definitely a big thing," he said.

But right now, his childhood dream of playing in the NHL appears to be getting closer to reality. Come the conclusion of day one of the draft, June 26, Werek will begin training in earnest for his first NHL camp.

Swedish teen jailed for anti-Israel rioting

JTA

NEW YORK — A Swedish teenager was sentenced to 15 months in prison for rioting at an anti-Israel protest during a Davis Cup tennis match in March.

The Malmo District Court sentenced the 18-year-old for throwing paving stones at police outside the arena where Sweden and Israel were playing behind closed doors. He also was found guilty of drug possession.

Police detained nearly 100 people and arrested 10 during the March 7 riots.

Spectators were not allowed at the matches because Malmo city officials said they could not guarantee security due to the Israeli army's operations in Gaza.

The Davis Cup Committee fined the Swedish tennis federation $25,000 (US) and banned Malmo from hosting Davis Cup matches for five years.

Maccabi Tel Aviv to play Knicks, Clippers

JTA

NEW YORK — Maccabi Tel Aviv will hit both U.S. coasts for exhibition games against NBA teams.

The team announced Wednesday that it will play the New York Knicks and Los Angeles Clippers in October.

Both games will benefit the Migdal Ohr organization, which provides shelter and education for thousands of abused, impoverished and orphaned children in Israel.

Maccabi returns to Madison Square Garden on Oct. 18 to meet the Knicks. In 2007, a crowd of 18,000, mostly Maccabi fans chanting the team's name, saw the Knicks defeat Maccabi, 112-85.

Two days later, the Israeli squad will play the Clippers at the Staples Center.

Tel Aviv has five victories in 18 games against NBA teams, according to the Jerusalem Post. Its 105-103 win over the Toronto Raptors in 2005 marked the first time an international team defeated an NBA squad on North American soil.

Inside Back

Food for thought

By MICHAEL GORDON

We live in an era in which everyone is very conscious of food.

We are bombarded daily by comments, articles, advertisements, medical opinions and experts of all sorts telling us what we should eat or should not eat for our health. It can be a daunting task to just find something to eat without having to worry about what is really inside the product and whether it's good or bad for us.

The Senior Side of Life

One would think that during one's later years, the concerns about the content of food would become less important to the eater and those loved ones who feel compelled to take "healthy" actions. Doctors and nutritionists and swallowing specialists may focus on immediate health-related concerns of food, while family members may focus on the long-term risks and benefits of foods.

Some years ago, I was visiting an elderly patient who I knew quite well. She had been hospitalized for a heart ailment. I walked into the room to say hello, and she looked at me and gloomily said, "Taste this!" pointing to a mound of french fries (or as she called them chips).

"Why?" I asked her.

"Just taste one!" she said emphatically.

I took a chip into my mouth. It had no flavour because it was saltless.

I said, "It has no salt and no flavour."

"Exactly! They told me I can't eat any salt because of my heart. I'd rather die than have chips without salt. I have eaten them all my life with salt and am too old to change now."

After some discussion with the responsible physicians, it was decided to address this issue by increasing marginally the salt in her diet and raising her dosage of diuretic.

Two days later, I visited and she said, smiling, "Thanks, they gave me some salt, and all I have to do is pee a bit more – no big deal!"

I recently heard of the situation of a frail 94-year-old nursing home resident who is still able to participate in some activities and eat by herself. She could also choose her meals from the menus presented to her. She had met with the dietitian and had expressed special preferences. The physician felt that despite some medical problems, she was competent to make many personal decisions, including the choice of food. She requested that she be given gefilte fish and chopped liver every day, or at least a few times a week.

She said, "They are my favourite foods and bring back wonderful lifetime memories and all the wonderful holidays I used to cook for."

Apparently, her daughter had told the dietitian that she wasn't happy with her mother eating so much gefilte fish and chopped liver because of the salt and fat content.

Many attempts were made to impress upon the daughter that the mother could actually make her own decisions, to which the daughter replied, "My mother really does not know what is good for her."

The mother told the dietitian, "My daughter always worried about my health, but at 94, I think I can take a few chances."

At the end, the mother got her way. Staff did their best to help the daughter understand the importance of respecting her mother's wishes and food preferences, especially at this late stage of her life.

All I can say is, when my time comes, if there is Scottish shortbread, rugelach or strawberry cheesecake on the menu, just let me enjoy all of them!

Probiotics can reduce bloating

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I often notice that my stomach looks and feels bloated. Are there any foods I could be eating to reduce this?

A. This is a very common complaint among people of all ages, and while this symptom can be caused by a number of gastro-intestinal ailments, some foods may provide relief. Make sure to also mention this symptom to your doctor.

Probiotics, which I have praised before, are the good bacteria in such products as yogurt and kefir. Probiotics are fabulous for soothing and rebuilding the gastro-intestinal tract. Have about one cup of yogurt or kefir a day, and after a few weeks, you'll notice a difference. Include both soluble and insoluble fibre in your diet. Get fibre from cereals with bran buds or cereals with psyllium added, as well as high-fibre breads. Reduce sodium intake as it causes water retention and drink eight cups of water per day, which is essential to allow the fibre to move freely, to help flush out excess sodium and for hydration. You should notice a reduction in constipation, bloating, gas and discomfort.

Lisa Weinberg is a registered dietitian/nutritionist in Toronto, in private practice and at the Genesis Professional Group. If you have any nutrition questions, please send them to The CJN.

Noah River Porter Rosensweig is 3

He was born on April 24, 2006, at 4:48 a.m. Miriam, his mom, did the work while, from the sidelines, I encouraged her to count and watched in utter amazement as our baby, God's newest creation, came into our world. He was magnificent. I was watching a miracle from within and (what seemed) from outside nature, a moment tantamount to the rainbow painting the sky once the waters have calmed.

URBAN WRITER

Three short years later, Noah has learned to walk, talk, sing, play, run, eat with a spoon and fork, say "cinnamon" (or actually "cimamon") and create a circle of love by extending his right hand to his mom and his left hand to me, at the same time. Noah has given us a new way of gauging time outside of the seasons, and of understanding what growth is all about.

Our little guy has also made us feel young again. Recently, I received an e-mail from his mom that said, "Make a butterfly with Noah this weekend."

Man, when was the last time I was encouraged to engage in lepidopterology with a toddler, sitting cross-legged on the floor, my fingers annoyingly sticking together from glue, surrounded by scraps of orange, red and green tissue while attempting to attach cutout wings to the paper body of a Monarch butterfly?

Never – not until my Noah came along.

I received another e-mail a short while later from Miriam stating: "Noah woke up saying both his knees hurt. I said, 'Like Daddy's?' and he said 'Yes.'" How lucky am I that a little person wants to be like me – even if it means figuring, in a Pickwickian sort of way, that his knees are bugging him like mine do sometimes?

And Noah makes us wonder about stuff. He will request (strongly) that we stop in front of countless storefronts along Eglinton Avenue, stare inside and let him know what everything is and is for, and how much it costs. And guess what? Right now everything costs "nine dollas."

Noah makes us laugh boisterously at his darling articulations and definitions. The elevator is as an elegator. Toothpaste is blue water, a cellphone was a celltone, socks were shoes, and red buses were yellow buses – in fact, every vehicle was.

Our gift from God, our Isaac to Abraham and Sarah, turned three years old and reminds Miriam and me how sad it is when a brown yaya (cat) falls off our wagon and "blows away."

His little brave heart encourages us to face our fears as he faces his, such as the time the alarm in my car went off without notice. We jumped back nervously.

I asked, "Noah, are you scared?" and he responded excitedly, "Yes! Do it again Daddy." So I pressed the panic button on my car remote. Our diminutive soul of a child stopped in his tracks and asked me to do it again, again and then again. So I did it again, again and then again.

I watched Noah as he worked through his fears. I know I must do the same. That's what he's telling me.

"Daddy, am I Jewish?" Noah asked me.

"Yes, you are little man," I responded, and we are proud of that.

"Daddy, I don't want to wear a kippah," my boy says.

"Yes I know Noah, I'm not big on that either, but let's wear it when we make a brachah [blessing]."

So he does. Sometimes.

Our Noah is three years old. Yesterday he was two, and the yesterday before that he was two, too. Before that he was in his mother's womb, and before that… well, he was somewhere. Today he has been entrusted to Miriam and me, and our village.

Happy birthday Noah. We love you. Thank you, God, for our special gift. We'll do our best.

"TAKE ME TO MOUNT SINAI."

For more than 24 hours, my abdomen ached, my vision was blurred and I had a raging thirst I couldn't quench. I knew I wasn't well. But I was stuck on a plane en route back to Toronto. When I landed, my instincts took over. I got in a cab and told the driver to take me to Mount Sinai. Looking back, I'm still amazed. The doctors, the nurses, the superlative care. They were there for me when I needed them most. Turns out I was suffering from Type 1 Diabetes and they prepared me for the next chapter in my life. When you get a scare, your instincts can save you. And so can Mount Sinai."

In Good Times Our Community Cares.

A salute to our community and its volunteers

UJA FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO
Across the street. Across the globe.

Volunteerism at its best

It has been said that volunteers are the lifeblood of any successful organization and perhaps nowhere is that adage more true than at United Jewish Appeal.

As two people who have been actively involved in both Toronto's vibrant Jewish community and UJA Federation for many years, we have witnessed – firsthand – the passion, vision, selflessness and compassion of our volunteers. Whether it's the hundreds of volunteers who help make our telethons an annual success, those who give their free time to make our Walk With Israel one of the Diaspora's most successful annual Israel solidarity events, or those who help us make community rallies the successes that they are - we simply couldn't accomplish what we do without you – our community's true heroes.

These times make what we do both more challenging and more important than ever and, as a result, make your contributions more essential than ever as our community responds to the needs of the most vulnerable among us.

As the incoming Chairs of United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2010, we consider ourselves fortunate to have the opportunity to work with Jewish Toronto's talented and passionate cadre of volunteers over the next year, and we look forward to accomplishing great things by working together as one.

Sincerely,

Being one of the Diaspora's leading Jewish communities doesn't simply happen. In fact, Jewish Toronto's incredible reputation as a dynamic, generous, transformative and visionary community is mostly due to the efforts of you, our volunteers.
Each one of you continues to bring your own unique skills to the UJA table – day in and day out – which, when combined together, gives our community a very comprehensive variety of abilities. Couple this with your enthusiasm, passion and commitment, together we bring to Jewish Toronto a myriad of programs and events unparalleled elsewhere.
It's wonderful for people to be caring and supportive when times are good, but you really get a true sense of a community by how it responds in the face of adversity. Today, as we contend with the worldwide economic downturn, you continue to roll up your volunteer sleeves to show your unyielding support for our city, for Israel, and for Jews everywhere - across the street and across the globe. It is truly an honour to be associated with so many wonderful volunteers.
Thank you!

Not what we have - but what we give

Although news about the economy is pretty gloomy in recent months, it has not changed a basic belief that we all share about what being Jewish means: Life is about what you give, not what you get.

The essential Jewish value of tzedakah motivates us on a daily basis, as it always has. Tzedakah, similar to the word for "righteousness" says: no matter what I have, I'll share it with you. It's the right thing to do."

Time is our most precious resource. Money comes and money goes, but a minute, once spent, can never be recouped. That is why volunteering is so precious and vital to the life of our community: it is a resource very well spent that makes every moment count.

In the Torah portions we are reading these days, we read a lot about what happens in the mishkan, the portable sanctuary that the Jewish people carried around with us for those 40 years in the desert. The Torah readings are filled with detailed descriptions of animal sacrifices, priestly clothing, construction plans for the mishkan itself, and a host of other seemingly small details. At first glance, these may seem far-removed from our daily concerns. Yet the message here is clear and reiterated in so many different ways that we all ought to be able to hear it: opportunities for reaching for something higher surround us all the time, and from every direction.

Life is full with chances to take even the most minute and seemingly insignificant parts of our day and use them for a holy purpose: to serve the Jewish People, to serve G-d. Particularly in troubled times, when the need to give through volunteerism may be greater, opportunities to give of ourselves are plenty. The kind of people we are and the kind of community we are depends not on what we have, but on what we give.

Volunteer Israeli emissaries make their mark on Toronto

Young emissaries with MAKOM Director Sarah Mali at the Jewish Agency Training Seminar in Jerusalem last summer. (l-r) Bar Shani, Tslil Zilberstain, Elinor Shtrull, Gal Ben Haim, Sarah Mali, Tal Grinbaum, Eran Shpigelman, Ori Unterman and Moran Dinur.

As he stood before the sea of students, all gathered at Toronto's Bialik Hebrew Day School for an assembly to remember the late Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Eran Shpigelman felt a wave of emotions. "I've never seen anything like this before," said the 19-year-old Israeli. "These kids really participated in the assembly. - they really connected with us."

And that is precisely the point of why Shpigelman and seven other young volunteer emissaries from Israel, have ventured to Toronto for a year.

The dynamic group is part of an initiative of MAKOM - The Israel Engagement Network - a partnership of Jewish communities and the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI). MAKOM's partner in Toronto is UJA Federation and is chaired by long-time UJA leader Michael Diamond.

MAKOM endeavours to provide young people and broader Diaspora Jewish communities with hands-on, experiential learning about what Israel really is.

"The aim of MAKOM is to bring Israel in different ways to the Toronto Jewish community," said Director Sarah Mali, from UJA's Community Capacity Building department. "They are here to be compelling and innovative and really speak to people in a way that creates new relevance in their relationship with Israel."

"Simply put, MAKOM exists to encourage the North American Diaspora to keep Israel in their consciousness; to see Israel as being part of their experience of being Jewish and being part of the Jewish People," said Diamond.

Shpigelman and his fellow emissaries, all of whom are pre-army teens, are being hosted by families from five different Toronto Synagogue congregations. Throughout the year, working six days a week, they organize, lead and participate in a wide variety of Synagogue activities, as well as Jewish day and supplementary programs, initiatives at Jewish camps in the summer months and events with Israeli Scouts.

Qualifying as one of these volunteer emissaries was by no means a simple process. In fact, candidates went through screening procedures to determine whether or not they had what it takes to bring a bit of Israel to Toronto. After they were selected, the new volunteers underwent intense training under the direction of JAFI.

The wait was worth it for these young men and women who, besides serving their country in the Israel Defence Force, wanted to give back to the Diaspora for supporting the Jewish State.

"Wherever the members of Toronto's Jewish community see the emissaries, be it at schools, prayer services or in their homes, the young emissary is a metaphor for Israel," said Mali. "By connecting with them, the community is gaining insight into current Israeli culture, which the emissaries live and breathe."

For Shpigelman, being in Toronto is quite literally a whole new world. "I have never been exposed to real Jewish life outside of Israel," he related. "It is incredibly interesting to me to see how and what Jewish people need to do here to express their Judaism. And it has made me so proud to see how strongly people here are connected to Israel."

Although the focus is on enriching the local community's concept of and relationship with Israel, Mali points out the experience has the potential to make an indelible mark on the Israelis, too. "Being in Toronto provides these young people with a unique opportunity to develop and enrich their Judaism," she said. "It will give them a more nuanced relationship with their religion and equip them with excellent training for the future."

The MAKOM young emissaries will be in Toronto until the fall when the next team of eight young volunteer emissaries arrive.

Students go "loonie" for the community

During the first week of December, TanenbaumCHAT's northern branch was home to a number of loonies running wild through its halls. Fortunately, the chaos happening inside the Kimel Family Education Centre on the Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus was all for a good cause.

Volunteer organizers of TanenbaumCHAT's UJA Week (l-r) Arielle Goldfarb, Alana Streisfield and Jaime Greenspan present a cheque to 2009 United Jewish Appeal Campaign Chair Fran Sonshine.

It was part of TanenbaumCHAT's UJA Week, which saw students and staff pitch in to raise money for United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2009. Organized by student volunteers Arielle Goldfarb, Jaime Greenspan and Alana Streisfield, UJA Week raised money from a variety of unique and fun initiatives.

"Every morning, lunch and afternoon volunteers sold blue and white sprinkled donuts which went like crazy," enthused Streisfield. "Throughout the week we had different activities running, including Shabbat-o-grams, themed lunches, which included an Israeli dance party, an Israeli shuk, and a raffle with great prizes like Raptors tickets and ipods supplied by UJA."

As for those loonies roaming the halls, fortunately they were part of "loonie for a loony", an initiative which saw strangely dressed students run around holding baskets, collecting spare change.

"The Grade 12 auction was our most successful event of the week," said Goldfarb. "Students from all grades were able to 'purchase' different grade 12 students to hang out with for a week. The students really enjoyed this, so much so that the highest bid was $250!"

"The opportunity for me to be presented with a cheque from the young people at TanenbaumCHAT was one of the highlights of my term," said Fran Sonshine, who along with Henry Wolfond chaired Campaign 2009. "The organizers did an amazing job of rallying support from the student body in a fun and creative way. At the same time, these hard-working and enthusiastic kids brought home the message to their peers that TanenbaumCHAT is part of a larger community and that they, too, should feel a responsibility to help others. We can all feel great pride in our youngsters and know that the future of our community is in good hands."

"Our goal was really to raise awareness of UJA within the school, and have full participation from the students, which we achieved," said a proud Greenspan. "All students and staff appreciate all that UJA has contributed to our education, including our new, beautiful building, and we feel that participating in UJA is a way in which we can thank UJA while giving back to the community through its annual United Jewish Appeal campaign."

One COOL Day warms hearts across the GTA

Working together with one common goal – to help others – more than 100 members of UJA Federation's Impact Toronto turned a recent Sunday in March into One COOL Day.

Impact Toronto participants pose at the Toronto Wildlife Centre volunteer site. [back row, l-r] Yael Manor, Charlene Somer, Kelly Becker, Kevin Rosenfarb and Annat Scheinbach. [front row] Brett Selbo and Kip Parker, TWC's Project Manager.

This semi-annual mitzvah-making initiative - chaired by Richard Goldhar – provided opportunities for volunteers roll up their sleeves at a number of community organizations, including several UJA Federation partner agencies dealing with the vulnerable, including Reena, JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto, Zareinu Educational Centre, Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living and Ve'ahavta.

"The clients certainly enjoyed their time with the volunteers, and they were a great help to myself and my staff as they helped with a carnival for clients of the agency," said Michelle Anbar, Program Coordinator for outreach and respite services at Reena.

"We all had fun playing bingo with the members," explained Jennifer Brodlieb, the One COOL Day volunteer Project Coordinator at the Bernard Betel Centre. "Positive feedback has been offered from not only the volunteers and the agencies, but the beneficiaries of the volunteer day as well."

After hours of volunteering, the day culminated in a "Food and Shmooze" at The House. Opening its doors about three years ago on Toronto's Eglinton Avenue, The House has quickly grown into one of the city's most popular and relaxing interactive places to explore Judaism as it pertains to the 21st century. Over pizza, participants had a chance to interact with one another, share their stories of the day and engage with Rabbi Rafi Lipner, The House's Director, in a discussion about random acts of kindness.

"One COOL Day was a tremendous success this year," explained Steven Ekstein, Chair of Impact Toronto's Hands on Toronto (HOT). "This event gave young Jewish adults an opportunity to help those in need and gave them great exposure to the organizations supported by their donations. The hope is that the introduction to these agencies has whetted the appetites of those interested in helping out, and has offered them the chance to learn about how they can further their commitment to the community."

Volunteers building bridges

By Ran Mesterman

As an Israeli who now lives in Canada, I am proud to be part of this wonderful Jewish community of Greater Toronto. I am a volunteer who combines a passion for Israel and tikun olam.

Ran Mesterman

I immigrated to Canada five years ago with my wife and three children. After the first year of hard work and getting settled, I felt a strong urge to be involved in the community. I started volunteering in the Israeli Forum and was quite amazed to see how the growing Israeli community appeared to be separated from the Toronto Jewish community. I realized we must connect these two Jewish communities, as only together can we ensure our children's future. Out of this understanding, I decided to start volunteering at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto as well.

My vision was to unite the Israeli Canadians with the Toronto Jewish community to become one strong and proud community. We turned vision into action and, together with a very dedicated team of volunteers and UJA staff, we started building bridges between Israelis and Toronto Jewry. The establishment of the Israeli Division within the United Jewish Appeal annual campaign offered the opportunity to put key Israeli volunteers into various committees. More than two years of hard work, trust, confidence and dedication enabled us to become an integrated part of UJA's 2008 and 2009 campaigns.

Today I am Co-Chair of the Newcomers Committee of the Israeli Forum and, as an Israeli Canadian, am very honoured to have been asked to become a member of the Board of Directors of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

I hope that many more Israeli-Canadians will follow my vision and be active participants in the various UJA Federation committees. It really feels great to be able to give to the Jewish community in Toronto, Canada and, of course, Israel.

Doing Jewish in Toronto

Volunteer Excellence: The Community Honours Its Own

The men and women on pages B5-B7 have made tzedakah and community involvement constant priorities in their lives. Their unrelenting commitment to Jewish values helps enrich the lives of so many. They will receive their awards at a UJA Federation Awards Night on May 7.

BEN SADOWSKI AWARD OF MERIT

UJA Federation created the Ben Sadowski Award of Merit in 1960, the single most prestigious acknowledgement the Jewish community bestows upon a volunteer with outstanding leadership qualities and years of involvement in the Jewish and general communities. With his unwavering commitment to people, Ben Sadowski z"l, the first President of the United Jewish Welfare Fund (predecessor to UJA Federation), embodied the definition of a natural leader. This award is his legacy to the Jewish community.

SHOEL SILVER

A born and bred Torontonian, Shoel has demonstrated his extraordinary commitment to tzedakah, tikun olam and volunteerism to Jewish Toronto for much of his life. However, his commitment to improving the lives of Jews doesn't stop with this city. Shoel's commitment to bettering the lives of Jews knows no boundaries.

Shoel is President of the Canadian Friends of the Menachem Begin Heritage Foundation, affiliated with the Heritage Foundation in Jerusalem. He also serves on the Board of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada, and the Lands of the Bible Archaeology Foundation. From 2003 to 2005, he served as National President of UIA Federations Canada. He serves today as a member of the Board of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), and is a Board member of UJA Federation's Israel and Overseas Committee.

Since October 2007, Shoel has made Jewish Canada even prouder thanks to his role as Chairman of the Budget and Finance Committee of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) – the first Canadian to ever hold this prestigious position. He is also a member of JAFI's Committee for the Unity of the Jewish People and he formerly chaired JAFI's Committee for Partnerships.

"Every Shabbat, just after we read the Torah, we ask Hashem's blessing on 'those who devote themselves faithfully to the needs of the public.' My experience has been that working in the community is itself a blessing. Very few experiences can be as enriching as contributing in a meaningful way to the Jewish future, and doing so in the company of dedicated volunteers and professionals. My involvement in JAFI has added a new dimension – the chance to work with colleagues from around the world. In working for the benefit of Israel, I am fulfilling the vision passed on to me by my parents, a vision Eileen and I pray we will instill in our children as well."

Past Chairs Lederman Award

This award, named for Harold Lederman z"l, is presented to an outstanding philanthropic leader and volunteer who is also a past Chair of the United Jewish Appeal Annual Campaign. Lederman, driven by a keen social conscience and strong support for Jewish communal life, believed in the importance of continuity. His message to future generations was to be responsible, a legacy of a real philanthropic leader.

HONEY SHERMAN

Year after year, Honey raises the bar when it comes to volunteerism, leadership and tzedakah within Toronto's Jewish community and the community-at-large. She truly personifies philanthropy.

As a past Co-Chair of United Jewish Appeal's Annual Campaign (2006), Honey's willingness to do whatever it takes for the community she cares so deeply about helped lead an astounding campaign. Today, Honey continues to lend her remarkable talents to UJA as the Chair of its bequest and endowment arm, the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. She also sits on the Boards of Mount Sinai Hospital, Baycrest, and the York University Foundation and is also involved with the Jewish National Fund, Technion and the Weizmann Institute.

"Nothing affects change quite like all of us working together toward a common goal. Together we can change the future. No matter how much you do as an individual, you cannot be as effective. We are each a thread in the canvas of our community and, only together, can we change the landscape of that canvas and the future of our community."

Phil Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence

This award honours individuals who exemplify the best in United Jewish Appeal campaigning. When it came to the welfare of world Jewry, few were more committed than Phil Granovsky z"l, who saw Israel and the Diaspora as an extension of his family. Granovsky's selfless legacy continues to help countless people in the community every single year.

DR. HOWARD PRICE

As a respected physician, and an equally respected, dedicated and compassionate community leader, Howard is literally – and figuratively – doing all he can to make the value of tikun olam – repairing the world – a reality. Howard, whose love for Jewish Toronto and Israel is evident in everything he does, embodies many of the same qualities of the late Phil Granovsky.

Howard has co-chaired United Jewish Appeal's Physician's Division and Professions Cabinet. He served as Vice Chair of the United Jewish Appeal Annual Campaign for two years, as well as being the founding Co-Chair of its Maimonides Society. He is the founding and current Co-Chair of the annual Physicians, Dentists, and Friends Mission to Israel, where Toronto's finest medical professionals meet their Israeli counterparts. Howard currently serves as the Co-Chair of UJA's Partners Circle. He has also lent his talents to Ve'ahavta as a past President and Board member and currently sits on the Boards of Hillel of Greater Toronto and Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

"I have always felt that our community must not allow any one of us to stand alone in times of need. By becoming involved in UJA Federation, I have had the honour to share that goal with many dedicated professionals and volunteers."

Gordy Wolfe Award in Jewish Communal Professional Leadership

This award honours the memory of Gordy Wolfe z"l, the consummate professional who served as Executive Director of Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS) for 22 years. The award recognizes a visionary professional communal leader who, like Gordy, has made a substantive difference in the life of Jewish Toronto.

STEVE AIN

Since beginning his career with Canadian Jewish Congress 39 years ago, Steve has held every senior professional position in the UJA Federation field.

After serving as Soviet Jewry and Youth Services Director in the early 70s, Steve went on to assume the position of United Jewish Appeal Campaign Director, and in 1985, became the youngest person ever appointed to lead the Toronto Federation.

In the early 90s, Steve became the Executive Vice President of UIA Federations Canada. He also served as Interim COO of the fledgling United Jewish Communities, the umbrella organization representing Jewish Federations and independent communities in North America based in New York. He came back to Toronto and was the UJA Vice President for Integrated Development before assuming his current position as Senior Development Officer for UJA's Tomorrow Capital Campaign. During his career, Steve has taught at numerous Professional Development Institutes across North America, and recruited many of the current professional leaders of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"Gordy Wolfe was one of my very early mentors in Jewish Communal Service. Receiving this award, named for him, makes the honour even more meaningful. I can only hope that my years of service and leadership serve as an example to younger professionals and encourage them to continue this great tradition of working for our community and Klal Yisroel."

Volunteer Excellence:

Leadership Development Awards

The Leadership Development Awards, established to encourage young men and women to assume community leadership roles, are presented to those individuals who demonstrate extraordinary commitment and service.

DANIEL DAVIAU

Dan has been active in United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto for several years, holding such leadership roles as Chair of Major Gifts in 2004, Chair of New Gifts in 2007 and 2009 Chair of Top Gifts. He also served on UJA Federation's former JTT and Family Philanthropy Committees.

Dan has also assumed leadership roles with a variety of other organizations, including The Crones and Colitis Foundation of Greater Toronto, The Hospital for Sick Children (Industry Leader), Mount Sinai Hospital Development Committee and the Joint MBA/LLB Alumni Association.

"Through UJA so many people give so much of their thought, time, effort and resources to our community - the central point of which is the word 'community.' Over the years, I have become involved because I want to help make our community as good as it possibly can be, whether here in Toronto or more broadly in Israel and elsewhere in the world. It is this sense of community that we want to pass on to our children so that it can continue to grow stronger and assist even more people in the future."

JEFF ROSENTHAL

Having begun his volunteer involvement as a canvasser in the United Jewish Appeal's Finance Division, Jeff has gone on to many prominent leadership roles. He has co-chaired both the Finance and Major Gifts Divisions, co-chaired the 2008 Campaign Launch, and led a number of missions to Israel. Along with Sherry Firestone, he will serve as Co-Chair of the 2011 United Jewish Appeal campaign.

In addition, he is a member of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto Investment Committee, is actively involved with Mount Sinai Hospital, and is the current Chairman of the Board and Past President of The Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation.

"Working with UJA over the years has really opened my eyes to the needs of the community both locally and in Israel. It has been an absolute pleasure and an education to work with the outstanding professional staff and so many truly dedicated volunteers who are like-minded in their philanthropic pursuits. One of the real rewards for Lori and I has been to see our young children acknowledge and embrace the idea of helping those in need and engage in their own projects. The community experience has become a large part of our lives. ... We look forward to continuing our family's involvement and support."

Professional Advisory Committee Award of Excellence

The PAC Award of Excellence of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto recognizes the outstanding contribution made to the Foundation by professionals in our community. It also recognizes the long-term impact their contributions make to lawyers, accountants, estate planners and especially to the charitable organizations who reap the benefit of their efforts. The award honours professionals who encourage their clients to consider charity as part of their estate planning process and who are the ardent ambassadors and champions of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

BARRY CORBIN

Barry has been a member of the Jewish Foundation's Professional Advisory Committee (PAC) for more than twenty years.

He served as its Chair between 2001 and 2004. As an award-winning estates practitioner for 27 years, he has made presentations at PAC educational programs offered to professional advisers. Barry is certified by the Law Society of Upper Canada as a specialist in Estates and Trusts Law and is the recipient of the Ontario Bar Association's 2008 Award for Excellence in Trusts and Estates.

Barry has regularly provided advice and assistance to the staff of the Jewish Foundation with respect to individuals wishing to include the Jewish Foundation in their philanthropic goals.

In addition for the past five years, he has been a member of the Rules and Regulations Committee of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park (Pardes Shalom).

"It has been a privilege to count myself among the group of professionals who regularly donate their time and efforts to carry out the mandate of the Jewish Foundation's Professional Advisory Committee. In doing so, they have contributed to the ability of their professional peers and of the Jewish Foundation to assist the broader Jewish community in effectively meeting its philanthropic goals."

Volunteer Excellence: Shem Tov Honourees

The Shem Tov Awards are presented, in partnership, to leaders representing the highest level of excellence in volunteer service in Toronto's Jewish community.

VERNON BALABAN
Kehilla Residential Programme

Vernon has participated in community affairs since the early 1970s. He is currently a Director of the Kehilla Residential Programme and was instrumental in writing its by-laws. He has previously volunteered with Hillel of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress, the Mizrachi Organization of Canada, the Canadian Zionist Federation, She'arim, Or Chaim Yeshiva, Ulpana Orot High School and United Jewish Appeal's Lawyers Division.

"I have been involved with numerous agencies, schools and, for the last twenty-five years or so with Kehilla, which is an agency whose mission is to provide affordable housing for the Jewish community. I take great pride in my participation with Kehilla and the role I have played in accomplishing that mission. I thank Kehilla for nominating me for this award."

TAMI BERMAN
Schwartz/Reisman Centre

Thanks to Tami's leadership as Co-Chair of the Hamifgash Program, part of the SRC and Israeli Forum, she has been instrumental in running the program successfully for three years. With her tireless energy, she has helped with the welcoming and engagement of the Israeli-Canadian community. Tami is a founder of the Hamifgash Community Theatre and was Chair of the Ilan Ramon Street Festival.

"Ever since I moved to Toronto from Israel in 1981, I have volunteered to give back to my community. I am grateful for the help I received from others and am constantly feeling that I am making a difference. I feel blessed to be able to do my part in creating a better world for our children."

HARVEY BERNSTEIN
Circle of Care

Harvey has been a member of the Board of Directors of Circle of Care since 1996. During this time, he has held a number of prominent leadership roles, including Treasurer from 1999-2002, Chair of the Strategic Development Committee, the Business Development Committee and currently serves as Secretary. In addition to his involvement with Circle of Care, Harvey was a long-time canvasser with United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto.

"Volunteering at Circle of Care is an important way for me to keep my life in balance: appreciating the many blessings I have enjoyed over the years and giving back."

ELLIOT LARMAN
Chai Tikvah Foundation

Over a 20-year period, Elliot has served in many volunteer capacities at Chai Tikvah, including Chair of the Admissions Committee and Vice President of Social Affairs. He has also volunteered at the Metro Toronto Branch of the Ontario Association of Social Workers, the Ontario Board of the Ontario Association of Social Workers and was a founding member of the College of Professional Social Workers, which became the Ontario Association of Social Workers.

"In the proud Jewish community of Toronto, Jewish adults with mental health problems, in need of continuing support and supervision in a Jewish milieu, have too few resources. However, this is less so now thanks to the Chai Tikvah Foundation where I volunteer as a Board member. There, I can help make a difference in this community from a different perspective than in my day-to-day work as a professional social worker."

STANLEY ROSENFARB
Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa

Stanley has been a part of every aspect of the services and administration of the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa (TJFLC). He is currently Past President and Chairman of the Board of Directors. His volunteer experience with TJFLC has exemplified the understanding that "when the chips are down you can always count on the assistance of the Jewish community."

"Unlike any other charitable organization, TJFLC provides its clients and volunteers with IMMEDIATE results, beneficial for the client and gratifying for the volunteer. From the interview process to the issuance of a loan cheque can take as little as overnight."

SARA ZAGDANSKI
UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

Sara's volunteer involvement with UJA is long and extensive. In 2005 and 2006, she co-chaired the Walk With Israel, and the Walk Festival in 2003 and 2004. With her deep connection and commitment to Israel, she has co-chaired numerous missions to Israel, including last year's Israel@60 year-long community celebrations. In addition, she has volunteered with State of Israel Bonds, Association for the Soldiers of Israel and Associated Hebrew Schools.

"Volunteering is an immensely rewarding experience. It is both a privilege and a responsibility to give back to the community and extremely important for each of us to do our part. The strength of the Jewish People is based on an unbreakable bond between Israel and the Diaspora, and UJA Federation leads by example, answering the call to action, nurturing our strength as a community and ensuring our Jewish future, both here and in Israel. I am proud to belong to such a richly diverse and proactive community which collectively embraces the essential Jewish values of tzedakah, chesed, tikun olam and ahavat Yisrael."

More than 15,000 walkers, sponsors and volunteers, forming a sea of blue and white, took to the streets of downtown Toronto at the United Jewish Appeal's Walk with Israel 2008. The massive turnout expressed the Toronto Jewish community's support of the people of Israel.

ANSWERING THE CALL

Close to 350 dedicated canvassers participated in telethons during an exciting week in September (Super Sunday/Super Week) to raise funds for United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2009. A highlight of Super Sunday was the presence of Toronto's EZ ROCK 97.3 and personality Jessica Baker, who broadcast live from the Lipa Green Building on the Sherman Campus. "It's amazing to see how both canvassers and donors come together for this event. It says a lot about Toronto's Jewish community," Baker noted.

U.S. funds may be tied to Schalit's release

Noam Schalit

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

A new initiative launched last week by U.S. politicians and supporters of the father of Gilad Schalit is the latest attempt to gain the release of the captured Israeli soldier by asking western governments to link promised aid to Gaza with Schalit's freedom.

An emotional request by Gilad's father, Noam Schalit, posted recently on Aish.com's "Freedom for Gilad" website (dogood.aish.com/gilad), the elder Schalit asks viewers to do "something to help" bring Gilad home.

"Imagine he was your son or brother," Schalit beseeches. "You would do whatever you can."

The Aish website contains a petition calling on the American public to support the initiative. It reads: "We, the undersigned, call on the United States government to make its $300-million humanitarian aid pledge to the people of Gaza conditional upon the Hamas leadership releasing Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, held in captivity for over 1,000 days."

Gilad Schalit has been in captivity for nearly three years, after being kidnapped on June 25, 2006, by Hamas operatives in a cross-border raid from the Gaza Strip.

The News in Brief

Canada

Koffler Dumps Artist

TORONTO — Toronto's Koffler Centre of the Arts withdrew its support last week from an exhibit it was co-sponsoring because it said it learned the artist publicly backed Israel Apartheid Week. Audio artist Reena Katz was slated to open a "sound and social performance" about Kensington Market titled each hand as they are called in the market this week, curated by Kim Simon for the Koffler Centre. "As a Jewish cultural institution, an agency of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Koffler Centre… will not associate with an artist who publicly advocates the extinction of Israel as a Jewish state," federation said. It said the exhibit will go on as scheduled, but the Koffler Centre is "disassociating itself from the artist and will not promote the exhibition… from this point forward. Any promotional pieces for this exhibition carrying the Koffler… name or logo were produced before the Koffler came to this decision."

Extradition Accepted

CALGARY — Criminal charges against a notorious Israeli computer hacker arrested last summer in Calgary have been dropped in exchange for him agreeing to be extradited to New York to face charges of hacking into financial institutions worldwide. Ten charges against Ehud Tenenbaum, including making, having or dealing in instruments for forging credit cards, were dropped, Sun Media reported. The Canadian charges alleged Tenenbaum helped hack into a Calgary financial institution's database, leading to theft of $1.8 million. His lawyer said he agreed to the deal in order to face one set of charges and because it's hard to fight extradition. Known as "the Analyzer," Tenenbaum masterminded the hacking of Pentagon computers in the late 1990s.

Diamonds Shine

VANCOUVER — Gordon and Leslie Diamond received Simon Fraser University's 2009 President's Distinguished Community Leadership Award for their philanthropy at an April 29 gala in Vancouver. The Diamond Foundation, established in 1985, is one of Canada's largest family charitable organizations.

World

Appeal Rejected

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Supreme Court rejected without comment a bid by John Demjanjuk to stop his deportation. The May 7 rejection seems to leave no avenue for appeal for the ex- Nazi death camp guard. Germany wants to try Demjanjuk, 89, a retired Cleveland-area auto worker, for his role in 29,000 murders in the Sobibor death camp. He had appealed the deportation, citing frailty. U.S. Justice Department officials, who stripped him of his citizenship because he lied about his Nazi past, released video recently showing him in good health. He was deported to Israel in 1986 and sentenced to death for being the notorious "Ivan the terrible" guard at Treblinka. Israeli prosecutors later cleared him of being "Ivan," but Israel's Supreme Court ruled he was a guard at Sobibor. He was released in 1993 and returned to America.

Branches Won't Close

CINCINNATI — The Cincinnati and Los Angeles campuses of the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion (HUC) will stay open. Discussions had been under way to close the two campuses of the Reform movement's four-branch seminary in order to save the financially strapped HUC millions of dollars. But the idea was scrapped at a May 4 board meeting.

President Stays Away

SAO PAULO — Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad cancelled his visit to Latin America one day after Jewish-led protests in Brazil. No reason was given for the cancellation. Thousands of Jews and non-Jews protested in Sao Paulo and Rio de Janeiro against his Brazil visit, slated for May 6, which was to be the first stop on his trip.

British Pop Singer Adele Apologizes

TORONTO — British pop singer Adele apologized last week for anti-Semitic remarks she made at her April 28 concert in Toronto.

Speaking about buying two guitars from a pawn shop owner on the day of her Massey Hall gig, Adele, 20, told the crowd he was the "rudest person ever." She later blamed an error she made in a song on being distracted by thoughts of the man, adding, "But don't worry, he wasn't Canadian, he was Jewish." The remark drew silence and some nervous laughter, Sun Media reported.

"I just meant he wasn't a rude Canadian," she added. At least one Jewish patron walked out.

"What I said on stage in Toronto… at Massey Hall was not meant how it came across. But I completely understand how it was offensive," she said in a statement issued by Columbia Records in New York. "I sincerely apologize for being so naive and disrespectful! It was not my intention to be hurtful, and I'm very sorry."

Developer gives USDS $4 million

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

United Synagogue Day School (USDS) has received a $4-million donation – the largest in its history, and possibly the largest a Jewish elementary school in Toronto has ever received.

Larry Robbins, a USDS grandparent and Toronto builder and developer, is giving the school the gift to honour the memory of his wife Miriam. The gifting agreement was signed May 1, the one-year anniversary of her death.

The magnitude of the gift and the state of the economy make the donation "that much more meaningful for the school," said USDS' director of development Sheila Miller.

In a news release, Robbins said that his grandchildren "have benefited from the amazing education, warm community and strong sense of tradition that is taught at USDS." He added that Jewish education was very important to his wife, who was the daughter of a rabbi.

The gift will be divided among several initiatives, including an endowment fund, key capital projects and the expansion of the school's presence on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

In recognition of the gift, USDS will rename the school in honour of Miriam and Larry Robbins. The new name will be announced at a later date.

The donation will "put us on a path that allows us to use tuition dollars for education, and it prepares the way for the future," head of school Claire Sumerlus told The CJN.

Interest from the endowment fund will be used to meet the greatest needs of the school, Sumerlus said. Enriching the use of technology – the school already has SMART Boards in all its classrooms – and providing professional development for teachers are areas she offered as examples.

USDS, which began as part of Beth Tzedec Congregation in 1957 and became an independent school in 1961, serves more than 700 students from junior kindergarten to Grade 8. There are currently two campuses, one at Beth Tzedec and another at Beth Tikvah Synagogue. A Richmond Hill branch closed in 2006.

The school will open a full-day JK class in Vaughan this September, to be housed in the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Family Education Centre on the Lebovic campus.

A building called the Centre for Conservative Jewish Life, which will house USDS and Beit Rayim Synagogue, is being planned for the campus.

School president Leonard Abramsky told The CJN that the Robbins gift will "allow the school to move properly into the 21st century and to plan on a long-term basis for the future of many generations."

Widely acclaimed appointment

From the editor's desk...

Relations between sovereign states are always based upon mutual interest. States can be friendly with one another, but not friends in the conventional understanding and meaning of the term.

To be sure, there are examples of especially warm bilateral friendships. The current relationship between Canada and Israel likely falls into that category. Indeed, we are grateful for the principled, often courageous policy positions the Canadian government has advanced in recent times in furtherance of those special bilateral relations.

It is no slight to Canada, however, to acknowledge that the most important bilateral relationship for the government of Israel is that with the United States, the most powerful democracy on earth and home to the largest Jewish community outside of Israel.

The most important diplomatic posting for the government of Israel, therefore, is its envoy in Washington. The requirements of the job are more rigorous than the norm for all the other key diplomatic appointments since so much is at stake for Israel in maintaining the deeply allied nature of the relationship.

Israel's ambassador in Washington must be a master of the many-layered substantive aspects of the diplomat's responsibilities. But since a great deal of the envoy's work unfolds behind the scenes in private meetings and contacts with myriad high- and low-profile individuals of power and authority, it is vital that the ambassador be someone of impeccable character, dignified bearing and easy, genuine inter-personal skills, too.

Last week, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu named the renowned author, academic and scholar Michael Oren as the new ambassador to Washington. The appointment has been universally acclaimed.

That Oren is not a career diplomat is not a matter of concern. Traditionally, the Washington posting has been the personal call of the prime minister. And his qualifications fill the basket of the job description.

The 54-year-old Oren was born in New York. English is his first language.

His colleague at the Shalem Center, a Jerusalem-based think-tank, Yossi Klein Halevi, told Ha'aretz last week that "Michael understands Jewish vulnerability on a personal level, and he understands that Zionism is a gift of empowerment."

Oren's experiences growing up in the United States and especially his reverence for the bravery and sense of duty of his father and the generation that fought in World War II led Halevi to add that "Michael early appreciated the nobility of fighting for a just cause."

Michael Oren

Oren is a historian. He has written two widely acclaimed history books on the Middle East: Six Days of War: June 1967 and the Making of the Modern Middle East (Presidio Press) and Power, Faith, and Fantasy: America in the Middle East, 1776 to the Present (W. W. Norton & Company).

He is also a novelist. The Sand Devil (The Toby Press) is a collection of three novellas that tell stories of the Negev Desert.

He is an elegant writer, commentator and clear thinker. He appears uniquely to fit the bill as Israel's ambassador in Washington. And thankfully so, for the times are momentous and historic.

The domestic situation in the Untied States itself is unprecedented. The international situation, too, especially but not exclusively the concern over Iran, is unprecedented.

Once he presents his credentials to the administration, Oren will immediately pull up a chair to a desk covered with dossiers of the highest priority classification. The pressure will be unremitting. We wish him the wisdom, strength and abiding focus of purpose that the job will demand.

For a sense of Oren's thinking about Israel's current situation, readers can turn to the latest issue of Commentary (May). Oren was one of five writers invited by the magazine to contribute to a special report titled Israel at Risk.

In his essay, Oren points to seven existential threats facing the Jewish state.

- The Loss of Jerusalem;
- The Arab Demographic Threat;
- Delegitimization;
- Terrorism;
- A Nuclear-Armed Iran;
- The Hemorrhaging of Sovereignty;
- Corruption.

His essay is a concisely written primer. It is important reading for anyone interested in the survival of the Jewish state.

I reproduce part of its conclusion: "Though remedies exist for all of the monumental threats facing Israel, contemplating them can nevertheless prove dispiriting. A historical context can, however, be helpful. Israel has always grappled with mortal dangers, many more daunting than those of today, and yet managed to prevail.

"Though the severity of the threats jeopardizing Israel's existence must never be underestimated, neither should Israel's resilience and national will. That persistence reflects, at least in part, the success of the Jewish people to surmount similar dangers for well over 3,000 years. Together with Diaspora Jewry and millions of Israel supporters abroad, Israel cannot not only survive these perils but, as in the past, it can thrive."

Jewish groups help guide new Ontario poverty bill

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Jewish groups and other social advocacy organizations are taking credit for helping to make the Ontario government's Bill 152 – the Poverty Reduction Act – more responsive to community concerns.

Specifically, they say that for the first time, Bill 152 enshrines into law the province's responsibility to set poverty-reduction targets and action plans every five years based partly on consultations with affected groups, individuals and communities most at risk.

The legislation received royal assent May 6, but last month, representatives from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress were given 10 minutes to give their input on the bill to the province's standing committee on social policy.

In preparation, the two organizations convened a Social Policy Table to bring together "Jewish leaders from the social service sector to make recommendations to government" and discuss their thoughts on how to reduce poverty in the community and the province in general, federation said.

At the policy table were representatives from organizations such as Jewish Family & Child, Jewish Vocational Services, JIAS, March of Dimes, Kehilla and Chai Tikvah, among others.

The current estimate of Jews living below the poverty line in Ontario is 25,000 people – or 11.2 per cent of the community – according to both Congress and the federation. Of those, nearly 3,800 are children under 14.

Frank Bialystok, CJC's Ontario region chair and one of the presenters at Queen's Park, told The CJN that Congress was "pleased with the united front we presented to the government."

"The key recommendation accepted was that there will now be consultations with the [voluntary] sector," he said.

David Spiro, the federation's public affairs committee chair, called the bill "important" and said he was "proud of our involvement in this first step on the road to reducing poverty for all Ontarians.

"The fact that we were asked to present a Jewish community voice to the standing committee… sends a clear message to our community and in particular, to our social policy table, that we have a critical role to play."

Though he was disappointed that a recommendation to specify the goal of a "poverty-free Ontario" was rejected, Bialystok said the fact that Liberal MPP Deb Matthews – who introduced the act – turned up to personally listen to the Jewish community's deputation "bodes well for the government's potential to consult with the Jewish community directly in the future to reduce poverty."

The jointly run federation-Congress Social Policy Table will continue meeting to continue this work on behalf of the Jewish community's needs, a federation spokesperson confirmed.

Security funding renewed

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Public Safety Minister Kevin Van Loan said a federal government program that provides funds for security enhancements to communities at risk of being victims of hate crimes will be extended for a third year.

Van Loan made the announcement at a press conference on Sunday at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber and Thornhill Tory MP Peter Kent were also in attendance.

Van Loan said the Security Infrastructure Program (SIP) is intended to provide support for all communities in need of assistance against threats and acts of violence and terrorism, not just the Jewish community.

The $3-million, three-year pilot project was announced by former public safety minister Stockwell Day in 2007. Sunday's announcement confirmed that up to $1 million will be made available for the final year.

Van Loan said that any communities that had not yet applied for funds could do so by the June 17 deadline.

The minister, who visited the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., recently, said that "fairly innocuous hate-motivated crimes, small acts of vandalism, small acts that made a community feel insecure" allow for "greater, more heinous acts to take place."

Farber said that "the very fact that our government understands the need for [security programs] and comes to the fore in such a strong way, brings, I think, a lot of confidence to the community. It speaks volumes to a government that understands the need to endure, that there's a level of comfort, there's an ease, that communities feel protected."

Farber recalled an attack on a Jewish day school in Montreal two years ago. The perpetrators were captured on camera and eventually prosecuted. The increased use of security cameras on public grounds of Jewish institutions is an example of ways the SIP program can improve safety measures for Toronto's citizens, he said.

CJC co-president Rabbi Reuven Bulka said in a statement that "we know from experience, underneath the violence and physical damage of hate crimes, there is a deeper psychological damage to the victimized community who feel isolated, vulnerable and unwelcome."

In 1957, Barry and Philomena Lowes pursued their dream and founded Camp Timberlane, a residential summer camp located on a private lake in Haliburton Ontario. Their vision was to create a camping experience that would build confidence, spirit and leadership. They strived to provide a nurturing environment that would recognize a person's uniqueness and where values would be learned that would benefit them over a lifetime. The tradition continues today and is being carried on for future generations by the present Director and owner Corey Mandell.

After 52 years, Barry and Phil are committed more than ever to their life pursuit of making camping available to the new generations of children. To make this possible, they have created "Share the Magic"; an endowment with the sole objective of introducing new campers to the Timberlane experience.

Mayor asked to cancel play at city-owned theatre

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

B'nai Brith Canada has called on Toronto Mayor David Miller to stop the production of a short play that the Jewish organization calls anti-Semitic from running at the city-owned Theatre Passe Muraille.

"We call on Mayor Miller to ensure that our tax dollars are not inadvertently being used for the promotion of a play whose thrust is anti-Semitic," Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice-president, said in a statement last week.

Seven Jewish Children: A Play for Gaza, written by British playwright Caryl Churchill after Israel's recent war in the Palestinian territory, will be presented for free at the Directors' Showcase and Exchange from May 15 to 17.

The event, co-sponsored by Crow's Theatre and the National Theatre School of Canada, will also feature the works of graduates of the National Theatre School's director program.

The controversial 10-minute play made its Canadian debut earlier this month in Montreal, when Quebec Jewish Congress' incoming president, Adam Atlas, told The CJN that it's "anti-Semitic and full of hatred... It culminates with a depiction of Jews as ghoulish, bloodthirsty and heartless killers."

The 1,300-word play, whose text is readily available on the Internet, depicts Jews as being self-righteous, uncaring and condescending about the plight of the Palestinian people.

The play unfolds as if a Jewish parent is equivocating between what to tell a girl about the Jewish presence in Israel and relations with Arabs in order not to frighten her.

"Tell her they want their children killed to make people sorry for them... Tell her we're the iron fist now, tell her it's the fog of war, tell her we won't stop killing them till we're safe... Tell her they're animals living in rubble now, tell her I wouldn't care if we wiped them out," reads one excerpt near the end.

B'nai Brith Canada calls the show anti-Semitic

"Tell her we're the chosen people, tell her I look at one of their children covered in blood and what do I feel? Tell her all I feel is happy it's not her."

Miller's spokesperson Stuart Green said the mayor's office received a letter from B'nai Brith, but as of last week, his office had not had a chance to prepare a response.

"We don't want to respond to the letter through the media. We want to respond to their letter to them," Green said.

The Toronto Star, however, quoted Miller as saying, "We own the building, but we don't determine what theatre groups in this city play, nor should we."

Dimant said the play doesn't criticize Israel exclusively.

"It is clearly aimed at maligning Jews, depicting them as oppressors of Palestinians, blood-thirsty aggressors and child killers. It disturbingly inverts history, using Holocaust imagery to allege that the Jews, once the victims, are actively teaching their own children callous disregard for the suffering of others."

Chris Abraham, Crow's Theatre's artistic director, said that he hasn't received letters or phone calls of complaint from Torontonians, but instead has received "encouragement from members of the Jewish community."

He said he's heard from members of Independent Jewish Voices – an organization that says it's "opposed to the Israeli occupation of Palestinian territories" and sponsored the play's production in Montreal – as well as individual members of the Jewish community.

"They've been in touch with me to sort of indicate their support," Abraham said.

"I do recognize that the play is a provocative piece, and I hope that all diversity of perspectives are able to come and check out the piece and make their own opinions... The work should be seen and assessed on its own merits."

The play had its premiere in February at London's Royal Court Theatre amid controversy. The Board of Deputies of British Jews accused its author of being "anti-Israel," while the Zionist Federation of Great Britain and Ireland called it "a modern blood libel." Sixty well-known British Jews also published a letter in the Daily Telegraph saying the play reinforces "false stereotypes."

Heart of Darkness

Gilad Schalit has spent more than 1,000 days as a captive of Hamas. Kidnapped 1,054 days ago, he remains the ill-treated, abused, tormented human pawn of an inhuman, cynical regime of genocidal terrorists and haters of Jews.

"The kidnapping of Israeli soldiers has become a strategic vision for Hamas," said Abdel Latif Qanou, a Hamas spokesperson in northern Gaza last month. Without the release of hundreds of Palestinian prisoners from Israeli jails, Qanou said, "Schalit would never see daylight."

And thus, in the succinct prose of the devil's advocate, Qanou explained both the means and the ends of the "democratically elected" leaders of the people of Gaza whose public policy, we are sad to note, evokes no opprobrium from those who so vocally, indignantly and some so self-righteously feel the pain of the world's oppressed.

It is difficult to understand how and why individuals who are moved by the plight of the people of Gaza, for example, are so little-moved by the plight of young Gilad Schalit. It is also difficult to understand how and why those same individuals who inveigh in the highest pitch of vehemence and umbrage against the Jewish state will not find a single word of criticism for the Hamas rulers who have kept Schalit beyond the reach even of the Red Cross.

Unfortunately, the efforts of the Israeli government to date have not succeeded in securing Schalit's release, nor has Israel been alone in trying to win their soldier's freedom. Canadian Jewish communities – and indeed communities throughout the Diaspora – have rallied and continue to rally for the young man's freedom. The European Union, most notably France, has spoken out on behalf of Schalit. Last October, Ingrid Betancourt, a former Colombian presidential candidate who had been held captive by the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia for six years, urged the European Parliament to work for Schalit's release.

Some members of the U.S. Congress have recently launched an initiative that would tie the $900-million Gaza reconstruction aid, promised earlier in the year by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, to Schalit's release. It is now hoped that Pope Benedict XVI will also join in the cause. At the invitation of Israeli President Shimon Peres, Gilad's father, Noam, met with the spiritual leader of the Catholic church on Monday. The Pope agreed to meet with Schalit's father. The press also reported that the pontiff promised to take part in the effort to bring Gilad home.

Not surprisingly, as Gilad's father told The CJN last week, the uncertainty regarding his son's condition is a hard burden of trauma and anguish.

Gaza is a place of darkness. Ordinary Gazans are exploited even as their pressing needs are neglected by their rulers, who, in the words of the writer Joseph Conrad, are the heart of that darkness. Only a concerted effort by fair-minded people, governments and NGOs can penetrate that darkness and bring Gilad Schalit home to his family.

CJC Quebec region name change (1)

I just finished reading Victor Goldbloom's guest voice "Background to a name change," as well as the letters to the editor on the subject of the Canadian Jewish Congress' Quebec region name change (CJN, April 30). I totally agree with the letter writers David Birnbaum and Manuel Shacter, who oppose the name change. Goldbloom seems to be pandering to the extreme Québecois nationalists. Changing the name to Congrès Juif Québecois will make as much difference as Mr. Victor Goldbloom changing his name to M. Pierre Goldbloom. There has to be a better way of proudly acknowledging our deep attachment to Quebec than crassly hiding our deep attachment to Canada.

CJC Quebec region name change (2)

I agree that the new name Congrès juif québecois will give us a new impetus to participate more effectively in Quebec society. There is nothing to be afraid of. The word "québecois" does not belong to one party nor to only one political direction – it covers all Quebeckers who live in this province.

I do not agree with the comment made by the people letter writer Stanley Baker discussed the name change with, that they "are Canadian Jews who happen to live in the Province of Quebec" (CJN, April 23). Jews are an integral part of Quebec and contributed to its evolution and progress long before there was a Canada. We can be very proud of this history. My family arrived as displaced persons in 1948 and chose to stay in Montreal, rather than go to Toronto, as the authorities wanted. We then chose to remain here, despite difficult political times.

Baker also states that "there is a hint of separatism" in the name change – an innuendo not proven and too easily uttered, especially considering the many proud Canadians involved in this decision. An innuendo that feels like it appeals to people's fears rather than to their reason.

Conference to promote one-state solution

I share Avrum Rosensweig's apprehension about the deafening silence emanating from our community ("Please call the meeting," CJN, March 26; and "Fighting anti-Semitism is pursuing freedom," CJN April 8). I am deeply concerned about the prevailing apathy of our brethren to a profound and imminent danger that threatens to engulf not only world Jewry, but the entire western civilization. Western nations are facing the threat of global invasion and conquest by radical Islam. So soon after the Holocaust, are we again paralyzed by disbelief or apathy while the enemy declares his intentions and mobilizes against us in broad daylight? Our strength lies in our unity. Too often in our past, our downfall has been preceded by internal disharmony, indifference and inaction. At such a time of peril for our people, we cannot afford to be either neutral or uncaring.

York University is co-sponsoring a June 22-24 international conference called Israel/Palestine: Mapping Models of Statehood and Paths to Peace, which will promote a one-state solution (which means no Jewish state). The Jewish Defence League is sponsoring a counter-rally. We should all attend. We must also use and withdraw our financial influence to publicly condemn York for co-sponsoring such an ignominious event.

Durban II

"I'm mad as hell and I'm not going to take this anymore." This quote from the movie Network was used in a column by Mordechai Ben-Dat in reference to the idea that everywhere in the world, as anti-Semitism grows, the Jewish voice must be loud and clear ("Not taking it anymore," CJN, April 8). I concur with him and believe that if the Jewish people speak out, those who are our friends will do the same. During Durban II, it was paramount that our feelings were heard so that the disaster we saw at Durban I would not repeat itself. It is equally important now that this United Nations "human rights conference" is over that we continue to speak loudly against anti-Semitism wherever it appears. My father used to say, "If it will be good for Jews, it will be good for the entire world." I believe that to be so.

Holy See has expressed political hostility toward Israel

By SERGIO L. MINERBI
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Despite strong opposition in the Vatican to his visit to Israel, Pope Benedict XVI was scheduled to arrive here on Monday. According to press reports, even prior to his arrival, President Shimon Peres was pressing Interior Minister Eli Yishai to waive Israeli sovereignty over six sites: the Basilica of the Annunciation in Nazareth; the Church of Gethsemane, on Jerusalem's Mount of Olives; the Church of the Multiplication of the Loaves and Fishes, at Tabgha on Lake Kinneret; the Mount of Beatitudes; the Basilica of Mount Tabor; and the Coenaculum on Mount Zion in Jerusalem. The first five sites already are the property of the Catholic Church, while the Coenaculum, the traditional site of the Last Supper, has not been in the Church's hands for the past 400 years.

The status of the Coenaculum, which today also houses a mosque, is very different than the others. Legally, it belongs to the local Waqf (Muslim religious trust), and during the British Mandate, requests by the Church to have it restored to Catholic ownership went unanswered. Israel is a custodian of the site only, and a decision to hand it over to the Church would create a new conflict with the Muslim world and would gravely threaten the status quo arrangement of 1852. Only preservation of the status quo can assure a minimum quiet in those sanctuaries, like the Holy Sepulchre, that belong to various churches. Moreover, both Israel and the Church are committed to respecting the status quo, according to the Fundamental Agreement of 1993.

There is no commanding reason to impair the status quo. Giving up Israeli sovereignty would mean that whenever a road would need to be paved, water or sewage pipes laid or electrical infrastructure renovated at any of these sites, permission would have to be granted by the Vatican. Interior Minister Yishai has objected to the move, claiming that such a concession would limit "the Israeli government's ability to function as a sovereign government in those areas." Israel could expect to be asked for similar concessions by the Greek Orthodox Church, from which it leases the land on which the Knesset and other buildings are located in Jerusalem. What makes the possibility of renouncing sovereignty especially absurd is that even in Italy, a tribunal refused to hear an appeal made on the basis of canon law (on another matter entirely), stating that it could pass judgment only on matters of Italian law. Should Israel be more Catholic than Italy? Definitely not.

Rather than considering phantasmagorical requests on the part of the Vatican, Israel could agree to the Holy See's legitimate request to obtain exemption from taxation for its institutions in Israel – a request granted under the terms of the Fundamental Agreement, but not acted on since 1993 because of the Finance Ministry's opposition and the Foreign Ministry's relative weakness.

The Vatican is so desperate for tax relief that the issue was raised by the Pope himself last year, but to no avail, when the new Israeli ambassador to the Holy See, Mordechay Lewy, presented his letter of accreditation. Maybe such a move would make it easier to take the issue of the six holy sites off the table.

I am not sure that Israelis are aware of the measure of political hostility expressed by the Holy See toward Israel. Vatican authorities did not object explicitly to the bombing of civilian targets within Israel by Hamas over eight long years, but were quick and vehement in protesting the army's campaign in the Gaza Strip this past winter. At the beginning of this year, the Pope himself protested five times in eight days.

Cardinal Renato Martino said at the time that Israel had transformed Gaza into a concentration camp. And just last Sunday, the Pope expressed his sympathy for the Palestinians, saying: "In a special way, I ask that you remember the Palestinian people, who have endured great hardship and suffering." Yet, I am not aware of any diplomatic measure by Israel conveying to the Holy See its regret and disappointment over the unbalanced and steady condemnation of Israel, at the same time that the pontiff expresses solidarity with the Palestinians, who, he said, live in a region "plagued by violence and injustice, mistrust, uncertainty and fear."

Unfortunately, the itinerary of the Pope's visit will not allow him to receive a detailed description of the complex political situation in the region. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, the only political personality scheduled to meet the Pope – apart from a ceremonial encounter with President Shimon Peres – will apparently go to Nazareth, to the Basilica of the Annunciation, to meet him. Very strange indeed, since diplomatic protocol would generally demand that the Pope pay a visit to the prime minister's residence, in Jerusalem.

Israel badly needs a complete reshuffling of its policy toward the Vatican. We should be much more flexible and forthcoming on fiscal issues, while alerting Jewish communities in the United States, which take pride in their good relations with the Pope, to the Holy See's very hostile posture on the political plane. After all, the Vatican still generally refuses to refer to Israel by its name, calling it instead the "Holy Land."

The potential minefields in the papal visit

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

The official Israeli government website for Pope Benedict XVI's upcoming trip to Israel and the West Bank promoted the May 11 to 15 visit as a "bridge for peace."

Others, however, described it as a potential minefield where various factions may try to exploit the Pope's presence for political gain.

"Both Jewish and Muslim ideologues are determined to stop the Pope crossing that bridge," wrote Catholic religion journalist Damian Thompson in his blog for the U.K. Telegraph, "either by smearing him as an anti-Semite or by making his visit to a Palestinian refugee camp look like a politically motivated reproach to Israel."

The German-born pontiff left for the Middle East on May 8 and spent three days in Jordan before flying to Israel.

The trip is the first by a Pope to Israel since the 2000 pilgrimage by Benedict's predecessor, Pope John Paul II. John Paul was a historic trailblazer who made promoting Vatican-Jewish relations a central policy goal.

Inevitably, Benedict's words and actions are sure to be compared – and contrasted – with John Paul's.

"It's unfair, but John Paul's warmth will be compared to the theological coldness of Benedict," Israeli political scientist Shlomo Avineri said. "The fact that he was in the Hitler Youth, though involuntarily, will make everyone look at every move and turn of phrase."

Several issues have strained Vatican-Jewish ties in recent months. There is ongoing controversy over wartime Pope Pius XII's role in the Holocaust, and Jewish groups erupted in January when Benedict lifted a 20-year-old excommunication order against a traditional bishop who turned out to be a Holocaust denier.

In Rome, Lisa Palmieri-Billig, the American Jewish Committee's liaison with the Vatican, told JTA that both sides were striving to minimize lingering problems ahead of the papal trip.

"All the problems that might have loomed on the horizon before the pontiff announced his trip are being muted within the perspective of the importance of the visit for bilateral relations," she said. "Both the Israelis and world Jewry are aware of this and want to nourish good relations."

On April 12, Benedict, 82, said he would "emphatically" bring a message of "justice and truth, mercy, forgiveness and love" on his trip.

"Reconciliation – difficult but indispensable – is a precondition for a future of overall security and peaceful coexistence, and it can only be achieved through renewed, persevering and sincere efforts to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict," he said.

The Pope's itinerary includes prayer, politics and pastoral teaching to local Christians in an attempt to improve interfaith relations with both Muslims and Jews.

He stopped in Jerusalem, Bethlehem and Nazareth, where there were open-air masses and meetings with Muslim and Jewish religious leaders.

The Pope visited the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial and the al-Aida Palestinian refugee camp near Bethlehem. He met with Israeli President Shimon Peres and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, as well as with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Official Vatican policy is to maintain an equilibrium of sorts in its relations with Israel and the Arab world.

"Its diplomacy is different from that of other states because it is always aware of the Christian populations," Palmieri-Billig said.

In Jerusalem, Oded Ben-Hur, a former Israeli ambassador to the Vatican, said the Pope's visit is proof that "relations between Israel and the Holy See are strong and solid." Ben-Hur said Benedict "has never missed an opportunity to reiterate his commitment to dialogue and to relations with Israel."

The two states formalized full diplomatic relations in 1994. But years of fitful negotiations have failed to resolve several lingering issues, including fiscal status and tax issues regarding Church property in Israel and visa restrictions on Arab Christian priests.

Meanwhile, Arab and Muslim sentiment ahead of the visit appeared to be mixed. One possible problem could be the Pope's last day in the region, May 15, which coincides with the day Palestinians commemorate as the Nakba – the "catastrophe" of Israel's birth in May 1948.

"The Pope's Palestinian hosts will certainly 'instrumentalize' this," Avineri said.

The Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem, Fouad Twal, said Benedict's visit to the al-Aida refugee camp on that day is a symbol of the Palestinians' "right of return" to the Holy Land, according to a report on Israel's Ynet news.

Pamphlets in some Arab towns called for protests against the Pope because of remarks he made in 2006 that were construed as insulting Islam. At the time, the remarks sparked protests in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, as well as elsewhere in the Arab world.

In Nazareth, near the Church of the Annunciation, which the Pope is to visit, radical Muslims have hung a banner apparently aimed at Benedict that quotes a passage from the Qur'an: "Those who harm God and His Messenger – God has cursed them in this world and in the hereafter, and has prepared for them a humiliating punishment."

"Everyone is crossing their fingers" that things go well, Avineri said.

Opinions

Leave Israeli politics to Israelis

Suggestions have again been heard in Israel that, to become true partners, Jews in the Diaspora should seek Israeli citizenship under the Law of Return and thus involve themselves in Israeli politics. Citizens of many democracies vote in elections in their countries, whether they live there or not, the argument goes, so the same should apply in Israel, the state of the Jewish people.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

The new government of Israel could legislate that all Jews, whether Israelis or not, vote abroad in the hope that the Diaspora will continue to support right-wing politics in Israel. Likud and parties to the right of it tend to have a strong following in Jewish communities around the world.

To include Jewish votes from abroad may, therefore, assure the continuity of the present government. Although some Jews have become obnoxious attackers of Israel, mercifully, many more are its uncritical and passionate defenders. They would now get a say as to who will govern there.

An even stronger right-wing government in Israel would further compromise the situation of over 20 per cent of its resident citizens, namely the Arabs. As it now stands, the new strongman of Israel, Avigdor Lieberman, wants to test the loyalty of Arabs in ways calculated to further restrict and intimidate them.

Understandably, Jews want to make sure that they remain the majority in Israel. The best way hitherto has been to immigrate there. One of the main reasons for the Israelis' interest – some say, preoccupation – with anti-Semitism in the Diaspora is that it may persuade more Jews to make aliyah. By allowing those living abroad to vote in elections, they could immigrate to Israel, as it were, without leaving their countries of residence.

Advocates of the scheme might even be prepared to ignore the anomaly of having people vote that neither pay taxes in Israel nor serve in its military.

The proposal, if implemented, would have a profound impact on the nature of Jewish communities around the world. It would prompt a shift from philanthropy, which has always been the main Diaspora identification with Eretz Yisrael, to party politics. This in turn would give our enemies further cause to describe Jews as a fifth column in the countries where they live, which, of course, would breed more anti-Semitism.

What on the face of it seems like a creative idea intended to bind all Jews to Israel may turn out to have very negative consequences.

On balance, a better idea would be to continue to collect money and promote tourism while leaving the running of the country to Israelis who actually live there.

God: for or against?

I wish to dedicate this column to the team of competent and dedicated educators and support staff I worked with at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education over the past 10 years.

I'm impressed by all the attention given lately to God. There are those who are so convinced of God's non-existence that they're advertising the fact on subway cars, while others are so faithful of God's existence that they, too, advertise it. As overjoyed as the ad companies must be, I'm taken by the fact that this is still an engaging issue in the 21st century. It brings me back to the Middle Ages!

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

In his latest book, Breaking the Tablets: Jewish Theology After the Shoah, David Weiss Halivni argues that at Auschwitz, God was absent from history, in contradistinction to His presence in history at Sinai. Absent, but not non-existent. And, of course, this is the approach to God in Jewish religion. God's existence is a given in our faith, but His presence has always been a concern, from the earliest biblical texts to our own days.

Indeed, one only has to look to Pascal's wager to see the foolishness of searching for some proof of existence. Pascal's "bet" on God is based purely on the idea that since neither side can be proven, it makes sense to opt for God's existence. It's the only side that can claim "nothing to lose, everything to gain."

I was once on a March of the Living bus in Poland when a survivor was telling some of her stories to a group of Orthodox high school students from England. It became obvious that she was a secular Israeli who had lost her faith during the war years. Not wanting to offend the students and being sensitive to their faith, she ended by saying they shouldn't assume that it was easier to be a non-believer. She told them how lonely she was without a God to console her.

My reading of that moving moment was that this woman believed in the existence of God, but couldn't feel His presence at all, and sometimes even yearned for that feeling. Could God not be the force that made her so sensitive to the needs of those British kids? Taken as I was by Weiss Halivni's book, I kept thinking of that Tel Aviv survivor throughout the entire read. Having a God and worrying about His presence or absence in history is a much greater existential problem than not having a belief at all.

I think the current debate between the Creationists and the Evolutionists is just as foolish as the subway signs for and against God. Our tradition holds that Rosh Hashanah is the birthday of the world as we know it – specifically, it's the anniversary of the sixth day of creation, when we humans were brought into the order of the cosmos. It is, of course, significant that we don't see ourselves at the very beginning of creation, something we have in common with Darwin's theories. But even more telling is that on Rosh Hashanah, we don't read the Creation story, but rather of the birth and near-sacrifice of Isaac, a story about our specific faith group, not a cosmic history.

There's no doubt that over the ages, we saw in the Creation story the "science" of creation, and there still are fundamentalist believers who read the text with that in mind. But it's just as true that from the very beginnings of biblical interpretation, we also saw the very true moral lessons and ethical teachings in every word of the first chapters of Genesis. Those of us who see contemporary science as an ongoing quest for truth by God's creatures – using God-given powers of intelligence, memory, insight and articulation – see Darwin as a wondrous complement to the biblical account, not a threat.

Those who believe in a God who welcomes faith-struggle by calling us Yisrael (the one who strives with God) know that God's presence or absence is the real issue, not His existence. As I heard my sister say years ago: "The God you don't believe in is not the one I do believe in."

Imagine: a return to religion

In his 1971 song Imagine, former Beatle John Lennon sang: "Imagine there's no countries \ It isn't hard to do \ Nothing to kill or die for \ And no religion too \ Imagine all the people \ Living life in peace…"

The song was taken up by youth culture, captivated by the singer's soulful desire to "give peace a chance," as an earlier song put it. Over time, Imagine was embraced as something of an anthem by idealistic utopians caught by Lennon's idea of a world living "as one," where people"shar[e] all the world" in "a brotherhood of man."

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Lennon's song captured a particular cultural moment. At the same time, it gave popular expression to a set of ideals and criticisms that have proved enduring. Imagine was intended not as a simple paean to peace – a secularized, rock version of Oseh Shalom – but rather as an anti-capitalist manifesto of sorts. "Imagine no possessions… No need for greed… Sharing all the world."

While those lines resonate with the visions of Isaiah, arguing for a just world, the song articulated a romanticized Marxist vision that involved the dissolution of such things as religious and national identity in favour of a universalist ideal.

You could say that Imagine encapsulates a messianic vision, but one displaced from the religious to the secular political context. Religion was lumped together with other things that caused people to fight and die, rather than being seen as a source of spirituality and ethics.

This view of religion as, at best, irrelevant and, at worst, destructive, has long characterized both academic analyses and radical political stances. But two articles that I came upon recently by staunch cultural critics place religion back into the arena as a source of sustaining values. The angle that the articles took, and the turnabout that they represented for their authors, caught my attention. Each of the authors argued that western culture – North America, Europe – would be the better for coming under the influence of Islamic fundamentalism.

In a recent essay in Commonweal, the illustrious Terry Eagleton, a British Marxist literary theorist, described western liberal democracies as populated by consumerist automatons with no compelling beliefs. He contrasted their inner emptiness with the "critique of materialism, hedonism, and individualism made by many devout Muslims," arguing that western countries would "be altered for the good" if they were to be influenced by Islam.

American feminist Naomi Wolf, in the pages of the Globe and Mail, argued that rather than viewing the veiling of women under Islam as the oppression of women and repression of their sexuality, we should understand it as a practice that supports the values of marriage and family. Best known for her book The Beauty Myth, which sees the idea of beauty as an instrument to control and limit women, Wolf views female modesty as a potential source of sensuality and liberation. Elsewhere, she extends this idea to Orthodox Judaism, as well. She contrasts Christian anti-sensuality with Islam and Judaism, where, she argues, "sexuality channelled into marriage and family life is seen as a source of great blessing, sanctioned by God."

One could argue that both of these authors romanticize religious devotion, and neither of them possess a deep knowledge of the religious phenomenon they describe glowingly. For them, religious commitment is a peg on which they hang their ongoing criticisms of western civilization.

Still, these two articles are a sign of the changing cultural winds. Religion, once pushed to the periphery of civic discourse, is regaining the centre. What will that mean for the way we live our lives as Canadian Jews? I, for one, will welcome a more complex, less trivial public understanding about the place of religious values and ethics.

John Lennon saw only religion's power to divide and destroy. As a professor of Jewish studies at a secular university, I am often struck by its potential to bring people together – not only co-religionists, in a feeling of solidarity and belonging, but people of different faith groups who respect religious commitment. Imagine.

The Kirshner File

Working for Jewish-Arab coexistence in Israel

To Faisal Azaiza, the Israeli port city of Haifa, with its mixed Jewish, Muslim, Christian and Druze inhabitants, is a model of multiculturalism and coexistence in Israel. "In Haifa, Arabic is not the language of the enemy," he said. "People mix easily in Haifa, as they have for a long time."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Azaiza, an Israeli Arab Muslim, has more than a passing interest in ethnic and cultural diversity. He is director of the Jewish Arab Center at Haifa University, which has the highest proportion of Arab students of any Israeli university. By his estimate, 20 per cent of its student body is composed of Arabs, a figure that matches the percentage of Arabs living in Israel. Furthermore, Haifa University has more Arab professors than any other Israeli university – 25 at last count.

Nonetheless, Arab-Jewish tensions have flared on campus. Azaiza, who also directs the MA program at the university's School of Social Work, is hardly surprised by the occasional eruptions of acrimony. "We have successes and failures," he said in an interview during a recent visit to Toronto. "Students bring to the campus the problems of Israeli society. We try to open doors and windows so that we can work together in harmony."

At the Jewish Arab Center, a unique Israeli interdisciplinary institution founded in 1972 to foster mutual co-operation on an equitable basis, dialogue is the name of the game. The centre, which Azaiza has headed for the past seven years, encourages research on Middle Eastern affairs and provides a venue for conferences and seminars.

In his own research, Azaiza, a PhD from the Hebrew University, promotes the values of coexistence. He has written papers on Arab-Jewish relations, bilingual education in Israel and friendship between Jewish and Arab university students.

A resident and former mayor of Daburiya, an all-Muslim village of 9,000 in the Galilee about 70 kilometres north of Haifa, he was an adviser of the Abraham Fund, which fosters Arab-Jewish co-operation in Israel, and a director of the Association for the Advancement of Equal Opportunity Between Arabs and Jews in Israel, known as Sikkuy.

As well, he founded and administered the first Arab geriatric nursing home in Israel, which happens to be in Daburiya. "The idea behind this project was to close the gap between Jews and Arabs in Israel," he explained.

To his regret, the gap remains wide open, tolerated by Israeli governments that have largely neglected the problem and have only begun to recognize it of late. "It's very serious, a case of discrimination," he said, echoing an appraisal issued by Israel's former prime minister, Ehud Olmert. Last November, Olmert said, "For 60 years, there has been discrimination against Arabs in Israel. It is deep-seated and intolerable."

According to Azaiza, 52, the unfair distribution of government funds to Arab municipalities is the most flagrant example of the none too subtle discrimination that the Israeli Arab minority faces today.

He cited a case close to home. While Jews in neighbouring Kfar Tabor receive ample infusions of infrastructure funds, Daburiya is left gasping for equitable funding. The end result is painfully obvious. Daburiya looks like a Third World village, while Kfar Tabor is modern in all respects.

There are also gaps in employment and education, he observed.

Schools in the Arab sector, particularly older ones, do not have sufficient computers and labs. "We need to change this."

The Jewish Arab Center, as written in Hebrew and Arabic

Confronting the grim prospect of unemployment, many Arab university graduates lower their expectations, taking jobs in Arab municipalities and schools.

And in the Israeli civil service, less than five per cent of senior managers are Arabs.

Shortly before he was interviewed, the Israeli press reported that 40 Arab Israel Railways workers had been laid off and replaced by army veterans.

In his view, Israeli Arabs are better integrated than 20 years ago and are much better off than in the pre-Six Day War era, when they were subjected to military rule and their movements were circumscribed.

However, Azaiza is clearly concerned by the suggestion, made by Avigdor Lieberman before his appointment as foreign minister and seconded by Benjamin Netanyahu before his accession as prime minister, that the citizenship of Israeli Arabs should hinge on a "loyalty" test.

Faisal Azaiza

"It's a joke," said Azaiza, who, as a university student, met Lieberman, who was born in the former Soviet Union and immigrated to Israel as a young man. "I'm not sure Lieberman is more loyal to Israel than Faisal Azaiza. This is racism. It's more important to talk about integration than loyalty. Lieberman wants to take us back to the period of military rule."

Despite a succession of Arab-Israeli wars since 1948, the vast majority of Israeli Arabs have remained loyal to Israel, he said, referring to a Shin Bet report stating that 95 percent of Arab citizens are loyal to the state.

"Too many Jews in Israel regard Arabs as enemies rather than as fellow citizens," he noted, saying that this attitude induces Israeli Arabs to accentuate their Palestinian origins.

Asked how he identifies himself, Azaiza said, "I'm a Muslim, Arab, Palestinian citizen of Israel."

He added, "The Arab-Israeli conflict affects us all personally. I want to see it coming to an end with a two-state solution. We were close to achieving one under Olmert. I'm still optimistic, because this is the policy of the United States and the European Union."

When asked whether Israel should be replaced by a secular "state of its citizens," an idea that Israeli Arab parliamentarians generally support, Azaiza replied, "I want a Jewish state with humanistic values. I'm not bothered that Israel is a Jewish state."

He does not identify with Zionism, saying that only Jews can embrace it. "But I'm sensitive to what happened to the Jewish people during the Holocaust." In addition, he respects the major symbols of Israel's statehood – the Magen David flag and the Hatikvah national anthem. "I can't change the symbols of the Jewish people, but they should be sensitive to our symbols and our pain."

In this connection, he believes that Israeli Jews and Arabs should be more attuned to their respective historical narratives.

Israeli Arabs are pained by the knowledge that more than 400 Palestinian villages were destroyed during and after the 1948 war, that hundreds of thousands of Palestinians were thrown out of the country, and that parcels of their lands were seized and never returned. To this day, a number of his relatives still live in Jordan and Syria, having fled Palestine as war raged. In his estimate, Israel expropriated more than 300 dunams from his family and about 2,000 dunams from Daburiya.

He recognizes that, for Jews, the narrative is radically different. The War of Independence was a war of sheer survival as Arab armies sought to wipe out Israel.

Azaiza regrets that Netanyahu, who presides over a bloated cabinet of 30 ministers, saw no need to appoint a single Arab minister. "It's a mistake. It tells me that this government is not sufficiently interested in integrating the Arab community."

On a related matter, he said that Israeli Arabs should decide whether military service should be compulsory for their community.

In closing, he took heart from reports that Jews in the Diaspora have begun to focus on the problems faced by Israeli Arabs.

But in a warning, he said, "If Jewish donors give only to Jewish causes in Israel, the gap between Jews and Arabs is likely to grow."

Masorti seeks 'mainstream' acceptance in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

For most of his life, Yizhar Hess, the 42-year-old executive director and CEO of the Masorti movement in Israel for the past two years, considered himself a secular Israeli.

That began to change almost a decade ago, when he attended a Conservative bat mitzvah in Tucson, Ariz., where he was serving as a shaliach for the Jewish Agency.

Hess – recalling his own bar mitzvah at a Jerusalem synagogue, where his grandmother could barely see him from the women's balcony – was astounded to see that the celebrant's grandmother not only held hands with her on the bimah, but was honoured with an aliyah.

Speaking at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue on a Shabbat morning during a recent visit to Toronto, Hess said (according to a copy of his speech provided to The CJN), "It was in North America, thousands of miles from Jerusalem, that I experienced my first significant Shabbat. How absurd."

As executive director of the Masorti movement, as Conservative Judaism is known in Israel, Hess says one of his main goals is to steer Masorti, which has grown to 53 congregations in Israel, toward becoming "a mainstream player in the arena of Jewish identity in Israel."

Citing the dichotomy in Israel between the religious and secular segments of society, Hess – a 10th-generation Jerusalemite on his mother's side – noted in an interview the day after he spoke at Beth David that secular Jews are not necessarily atheists.

"The majority are quite open to religion," he said.

Hess, a lawyer by training who also studied political science and Hebrew literature, would like to see Masorti recognized by the State of Israel, so that, among other things, its rabbis would have the authority to officiate at weddings in Israel and to oversee conversions that would be accepted as legitimate by the state.

Currently, if Israelis want to get married in a non-Orthodox Jewish ceremony or a civil ceremony, they must do so outside the country.

Hess said that many Israelis are "disgusted" with the status quo, but he added that, in the long run, he is optimistic about the future.

"I'm encouraged by the fact that 20 per cent [of couples who are marrying] decide not to go along with the system. It means we are not that far from the point where Israelis will say, 'Enough already. There's more than one way to be Jewish.'"

Yizhar Hess

However, he noted that the haredi Shas party has grown in power, indicating challenges for Masorti, at least in the near future.

Masorti, which was established in Israel 31 years ago, receives virtually no funding from the Israeli government, aside from "a token" that is earmarked for education only, not for religious services such as mikvahs that are funded if they are under Orthodox auspices, Hess said.

He noted that Conservative rabbis are not allowed to use Orthodox mikvahs for conversions.

Hess added that the Masorti movement has had to cut about 30 per cent of its budget in Israel because of the economic situation in the United States.

Among the programs affected by the cuts is a bar/bat mitzvah program for special needs children, which Hess said is the only one of its kind in Israel. Although it has not been eliminated, cutbacks mean that between 70 and 100 youngsters will not be able to participate in it, he said.

In addition to seeking financial support here, Hess is asking North American Jews for political support. He suggests that when they have the opportunity to meet an Israeli politician, they should "express their frustration in a very severe way over the treatment of the [non-Orthodox] streams [of Judaism] in Israel.

"[Politicians] need to understand that the majority of North American Jews think that the fact we are not treated equally in Israel is a big challenge for the future of the State of Israel.

"If the differences in how to celebrate your Judaism continue to grow, we will have problems connecting the young generations here and there. Israel cannot be a fundamentalist country."

But according to Hess, more and more Israelis are identifying as Masorti Jews.

He said that a survey last year indicated that 22 per cent of Israelis – more than half a million people – who planned to go to synagogue for the High Holidays said they would go to Reform or Masorti congregations.

Although such a large number did not show up for services – the total at Masorti congregations was tens of thousands, mainly sabras, Hess said – "the fact that so many Israelis said the shul they don't go to is Masorti represents a big change in Israel."

For many Israelis, he said, "if Orthodoxy is the only option, then there is no option. This is not where they want to be."

Doctors group fights anti-Jewish bias

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It was a question physician-activist Michael Bloom had clearly anticipated: does the world really need yet another organization dedicated to protecting Jews from the scourge of anti-Semitism?

Bloom, along with his colleague and friend Rob Zadik, had only a month or two ago created DARA, Doctors Against Racism & Anti-Semitism, a largely Jewish group that seemed to duplicate the efforts of long-established Jewish organizations in the field of community protection.

"Anti-Semitism is such a big problem," explained Bloom, "you need a multipronged approach." The work of existing organizations is "necessary, but not sufficient."

Where DARA steps in is in asking its members – doctors, dentists, medical students, academics – to use their skills, their contacts and their relationships to try to put out the fire of anti-Semitism in their own backyard.

Bloom and Zadik believe that in recent years, there has been a frightening upsurge in overt anti-Semitism worldwide, including in Canada, "where anti-Semitism is becoming fashionable in the form of anti-Zionism."

What's more, they believe that it is beginning to make inroads within their profession – at least if measured by instances in medical literature.

The Lancet and the British Medical Journal have been politicized against Israel for some time and both have carried anti-Israel articles, Bloom said.

And a couple of months ago, the Canadian Medical Association Journal (CMAJ) ran two pieces "on the effects of Israeli aggression on the health of Palestinians in Gaza," he added.

Bloom and Zadik see those articles as providing the impetus that led to the formation of DARA. Co-operating with Honest Reporting Canada, a media watchdog group, they distributed a talking-points memo to friends in the medical profession which addressed the allegations in the CMAJ articles.

"We sent it to doctors we knew," Bloom said.

In the end, more than 200 people wrote letters of complaint to the magazine. Among them was one missive jointly signed by 50 doctors. That prompted the journal editor to contact a representative of the 50 and they spent an hour on the phone discussing concerns about the articles.

Bloom and Zadik believe the CMAJ is now more sensitive to the issues raised by the articles.

Rob Zadik, left and Michael Bloom

"We don't want the CMAJ to go the way of the British journals, which are virulent in tone," Zadik said.

Impressed with the grassroots response to the CMAJ articles, Bloom and Zadik sent out another letter to hundreds of doctors, inviting them to an information session to discuss possible future activities. More than 50 showed up, and another 50 would have also come, but for scheduling conflicts. In the past few months, DARA's membership has grown to 238 members who work in a variety of medical disciplines and span a wide range of ages, including retired physicians.

The group's first organized activity took place April 6 when about 30 people braved "a hostile" environment at the University of Toronto to attend a lecture by Jewish and Arab doctors on health issues in Gaza. "It was an anti-Israel propaganda fest under the guise of medicine," Zadik said.

"During the question period, we challenged the propaganda and showed they were not able to talk with impunity, they'd be challenged," said Bloom.

Questioners brought up the use by Hamas of human shields, that ambulances were used to shuttle weapons, that Hamas attacked Israel from the vicinity of hospitals and that Hamas operatives hid from Israeli forces in hospitals.

Bloom believes the lecture played to DARA's strength – organizing on a grassroots basis to confront anti-Israel attacks.

DARA serves as "a wake up call to doctors" about the re-emergence of anti-Semitism as "a huge problem." It also is meant to "galvanize doctors to stop being apathetic and to use our skills, connections and credibility to help combat this problem," said Bloom.

With its monthly meetings, it "provides an organized forum to help doctors mount a co-ordinated response," he added.

Bloom and Zadik both have a background that included political advocacy. A native of Toronto, Bloom attended Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. As an undergraduate at the University of Western Ontario, he became politically active in the Jewish Students Union at a time when anti-Israel agitation was beginning to develop momentum.

His time for political activism shrank considerably when he entered medical school. He now works as as an anesthesiologist at William Osler Health Center.

Zadik attended Jewish school in his native Calgary. He served as president of Hillel at the University of Calgary before moving to London to study medicine at Western. He works as an anesthesiologist at Humber River Regional Hospital.

They admit they'd rather be focusing on their careers and families, but they believe doctors on an individual basis can make a difference. "We're not looking for recognition or self-promotion," Bloom said. "All I'm trying to do is help the communal response to anti-Semitism run more smoothly and effectively."

Gov't sued over disability funding at faith-based schools

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Dayna Blustein, a 14-year-old Grade 8 student, became deaf at age four after contracting meningitis.

When she attended United Synagogue Day School from Grade 1 to Grade 5, her parents had to pay for services such as an itinerant teacher to help her, and for amenities such as carpeting in classrooms to absorb extraneous sounds like footsteps. Blustein, who has a cochlear implant, now attends a public school, where those costs are taken care of by the provincial government.

Max Greenberg, 13, has a learning disability. The Associated Hebrew Schools Grade 7 student said he needs more time than his peers to write and to process information that he reads.

"I really don't think it's fair that in the province of Ontario, they don't pay for my disability," Blustein said at a press conference last week at Queen's Park.

The teenagers' families are among a group of eight families – seven Jewish and one Muslim – who are suing the Ontario government for not funding services for children who are blind, deaf or learning disabled and who attend non-Catholic faith-based schools. The lawsuit asserts that the government is violating the children's rights under Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The same services are funded for students in Ontario's public and Catholic schools.

The lawsuit was filed in 2007, and the case will be heard in Ontario Divisional Court in Toronto on May 27 and 28.

Ira Walfish, chair of the Multi-Faith Coalition for Equal Funding of Faith-Based Schools, said it's up to faith-based schools to provide all the resources for students who are deaf, blind or have a learning disability.

He said the government's policy of providing those resources to students in public schools is arbitrary and discriminatory. "This court action is a last resort," he added.

Allan Kaufman, a lawyer for the eight families, said that children with certain types of disabilities – even those who attend faith-based, non-Catholic schools – qualify for government funding for seven types of services.

The funded services – speech therapy, occupational therapy, physiotherapy, nursing services, dietetic services, training of school personnel to provide the services, and the provision of medical supplies for therapy – are considered health matters by the government and have been funded by the Ministry of Health since 2000.

However, resources for students who are blind, deaf or have learning disabilities are funded by the Ministry of Education.

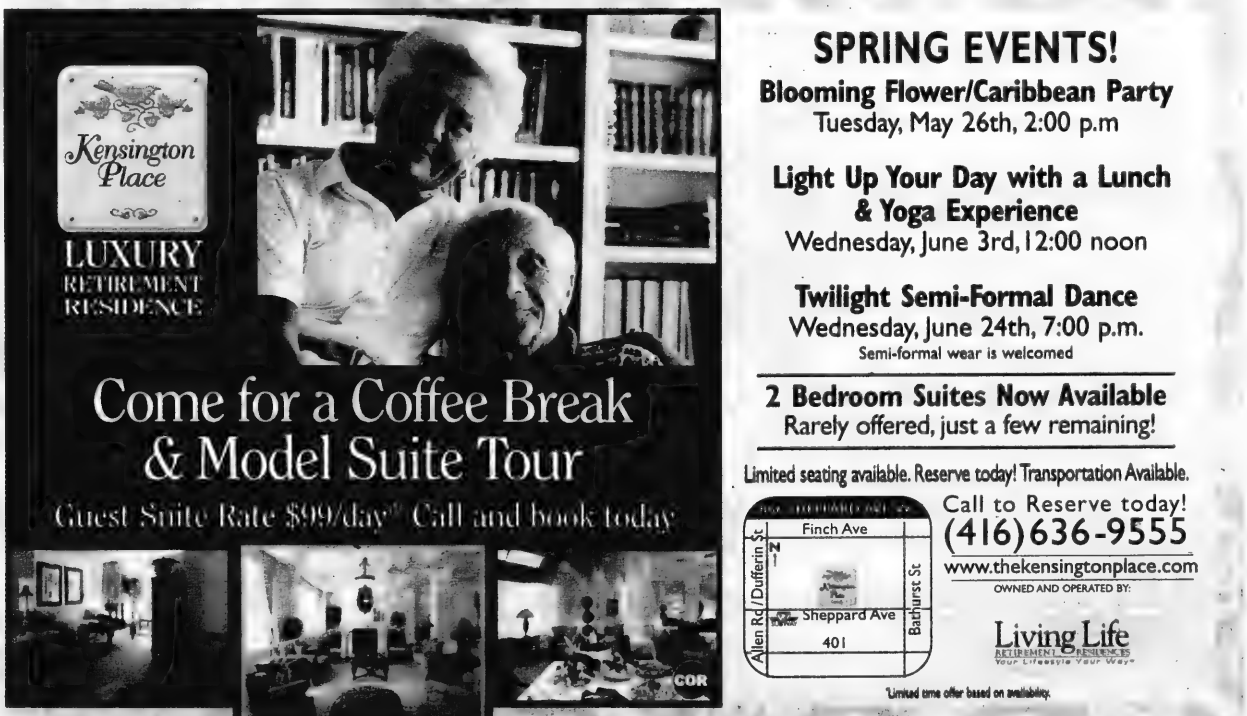
Kaufman said the Health Ministry sets aside $14.4 million annually to be shared among all students in faith-based schools for health-related disabilities, but it only spends about $4.5 million of that amount.

He believes the remaining $10 million would cover the cost of resources for students in faith-based schools who are affected by deafness, blindness and learning disabilities and can't access funding for necessary services from the Education Ministry.

Kaufman blames David Caplan, Ontario's health minister, for the situation. "His ministry of health controls the $14.4 million, which could be easily spread among the disabled children."

Walfish noted that children don't choose to be disabled, nor do they choose to grow up in a particular religion. "There is an element of responsibility on the government's part when it provides a program and does so in a discriminatory way. Government programs, like everything else, are subject to discrimination laws."

According to Kaufman, this case differs from one launched by parents of children with autism because, in this case, "the money is already there" and the therapies in question "are well-known, not experimental, and scientifically proven to be effective."



School project develops future philanthropists

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Project Give Back, a unique program for students in grades 4 and 5, has left an indelible mark on the students who participated in it, their teachers say.

Ellen Schwartz, a Grade 4 teacher at Eitz Chaim Day School, developed the project in her general studies class four years ago. The goal was to teach children empathy, compassion, philanthropy and communal responsibility, all of which require the efforts of both the home and the school. It has received rave reports from educators and charitable organizations.

The students participating in Project Give Back choose a charity and then learn to research information about their chosen charity, its mission and its activities. They then put the information into their own words.

Each student creates a visual presentation and a speech on the chosen charity and speaks about why that charity inspired him or her to try to help raise funds for the charity

"The children raise awareness for their chosen charity," Schwartz says.

The project, which closely follows the Ministry of Education's guidelines to enhance the grade 4/5 language arts program, has helped more than 160 different organizations, and many students have exceeded their teachers' expectations.

"The children have risen to the challenge," says Schwartz, who has experience and a passion for establishing charitable activities. She co-founded Jacob's Ladder in 1998, a charity named for her son, Jacob, who was born with Canavan disease, a severe neurodegenerative disorder.

The escalating success of the project is reflected in the expanding number of Hebrew and public schools that participate and the increasing number of teachers being trained for the next school year.

Schwartz told The CJN that more than 500 students in classes in Hebrew and public schools are now participating in Project Give Back, including Crestwood School, Eitz Chaim's Spring Farm and Viewmount branches, Netivot HaTorah Day School, United Synagogue Day School's Beth Tzedec campus, Leo Baeck Day School's south campus, and the Allenby and John Ross Roberston public schools.

"We hope to double the program in both public and Hebrew schools next year," Schwartz says. "I believe that the project develops character, builds confidence and life skills.

"We all know that if we give our children the proper tools, positive guidance and a belief in their accomplishments, the sky is the limit."

Schwartz's son Jacob visits the classes so that the students can see the source of her desire to help other children with special needs.

"The students ask well-thought-out questions about Jacob to learn how his day to day life differs from theirs, and they learn that even though he can't walk, talk, see, eat or even breathe easily, he can easily smile," Schwartz says.

"They learn the power of a smile, and actually see the contagious nature and impact a smile can have on others. Over the course of that one class, their attitudes are quickly transformed from fear to acceptance."

Project Give Back was launched with the help of several corporate sponsors, including Starbucks. It's operating in partnership with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, where individual donors can receive charitable tax receipts for directed gifts supporting Hebrew day schools.

For information and the complete list of charities chosen by the children, go to www.projectgiveback.com.

HAIRY DONORS: Students and a teacher at Leo Baeck Day School's south campus donated their hair to Locks of Love, a charity that provides hairpieces to disadvantaged children suffering from long-term medical hair loss, after growing their hair for many months in preparation for the mitzvah. Mayor thanks Jews for contributions to city

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Speaking in front of a group of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto staff and volunteers, Toronto Mayor David Miller shared his thoughts and strategies last week on ways to "ensure the city succeeds, and most of all how we ensure that nobody gets left behind."

About 100 people gathered May 4 for an intimate lecture in a Forest Hill home for Part 2 of the federation's annual speaker series called the Invitation of Invitations.

Before Miller spoke, Debbie Kimel and Ken Tanenbaum, the UJA Federation Campaign 2010 co-chairs, briefly discussed the campaign and boasted that it managed to raise about $65 million this year. (Last year's drive raised $66 million.)

Miller made sure to acknowledge the efforts of UJA Federation and the Jewish community for their commitment to community-building in Toronto.

"I've always admired the federation, because it helps build community and it helps build a city where everybody is valued," Miller said.

"I want to say, 'Thank you.' In a city like Toronto… we don't succeed unless everyone has a real chance, and that is what the projects of the federation do, to work so everyone has a real chance."

Miller spoke about Toronto's economic development strategy, called the Agenda for Prosperity.

"It passed council unanimously a couple of years ago, and I'm pleased that it did, because in these extremely uncertain times, you need a clear strategy," he said.

"Quite famously, earlier in this term of council, we couldn't get agreement on when to break for dinner. So to pass a document like the strategy for Toronto's future success unanimously, I think, spoke to the real depth of the strategy."

He said that the strategy, which was developed by business, labour, academics and members of the non-profit sector, has four principles.

The first, Pro-active Toronto, says that the city government should be an activist one. Global Toronto, the second principle, acknowledges Toronto's multicultural population.

"We have to view ourselves as part of the broader world," Miller said.

Third, Creative Toronto addresses the the idea that future jobs in the city should come from the "creative application of knowledge," such as manufacturing and research jobs.

The fourth principle, One Toronto, speaks to the value of social justice.

"We don't want to grow the economy just to benefit a few. We want to grow the economy so that every Torontonian benefits," Miller said.

He said that in an effort to help both the city and the business sector, a new tax incentive – an idea adopted from American cities – was introduced.

"The basic idea is that if… you are prepared to build on [polluted industrial land] in a way that will support certain kinds of jobs – biotechnology and other modern kinds of jobs – you will get a significant tax break on that site."

When it comes to helping people, Miller said that improving the city's employment rate has become part of the focus of the city's social services department.

"The first idea is helping people get employment and get a chance to live a dignified life," he said.

He added that the development of environmental industries can help spur growth in the city.

"When you do the right thing for the environment, you are also doing the right thing for business, because what is bad for business is waste, what is bad for government is waste as well, and what is bad for the environment is waste."

Miller added that as the chair of C40, a group of cities fighting climate change, he is encouraged not only by projects in Toronto, but around the world.

The mayor said that there is a rapidly growing city in Texas that paid to insulate every home in its new housing developments in order to save on energy expenditures.

"This initiative saved them $300 million. While the population doubled in this city, the energy consumption stayed the same," he said.

"It created hundreds of jobs, creating all the insulation, and it had a very significant positive impact."

He said that although this is not an initiative Toronto would adopt, he is trying to think along those lines.

A Sephardi heritage treasure in Alberta

By RABBI YEHIEL BENAYON

Permanently housed in the University of Alberta's library is a treasure trove of Jewish North African heritage, known as the Bension Collection of Sephardic Manuscripts and Texts.

In it one finds all sorts of correspondence between North African rabbis regarding matters of community, of ritual, of legal, personal and financial status. There are entire biblical texts, yet-to-be-printed religious and mystical works in manuscript, liturgical texts, as well as piyutim – poetic songs of praise.

Among these, are 100-year-old documents written (or at least signed) by the greatest rabbinic names, names remembered and venerated today by North African Jewry. In them, one can also readily find, brilliantly illustrated, the lives and times, the tensions, the joys, and the humanity of the period. This extensive collection represents the 400 years after the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492.

How such a collection came to be and how it came to the University of Alberta provide a classic case of fact being stranger than fiction.

Dr. Ariel Bension (1880-1932) was a Jerusalemite whose family had originated in the ancient city of Fez, Morocco. His early education came from his father Rav Yehoshua, a member of the mystical Jerusalem group (still in existence today) known as the Holy Community of Beth El.

Through A Sephardi Window

Bension's later education took him to western Europe, to the universities of Germany and Switzerland, where he earned a doctorate in philosophy and Semitic languages. He subsequently served as a community rabbi in Serbia, then for the World Zionist Organization and on behalf of Keren Hayesod as liaison to the Sephardi communities of India, Iraq, Indochina, North Africa, Egypt, Spain, Portugal and even South America.

He was a communal worker, Zionist, scholar, author and a lifelong collector of rare books, letters and manuscripts.

When his first wife passed away, he married Ida Siegler of Montreal, and that's how the Canadian connection began.

Bension himself died at the early age of 52, and Ida Siegler came into possession of her husband's large collection. In time, she sold parts of his collection to other collectors of and dealers in antique books. The segment described here finally came to rest in the library at the University of Alberta.

Some 20 years ago, when I first became aware of the Bension collection's existence, I – being of similar descent – recall being simply overwhelmed. Not only was I dazzled at the contents and importance of this collection, but here, I believed, was something else, something immense in terms of its spiritual and magical fortitude.

In the early '50s, in order to make aliyah or settle somewhere perceived as safer, North African Jews began to leave their host country of Morocco. At that time, I can assure the reader that in the minds of the Moroccans, Canada was a virtual nonentity. Certainly, even as a cold and remote destination, Canada was not one of the countries in consideration.

But meanwhile, there already existed in this country of ours – for at least a decade – the sole literary depository of our culture, of our sanctity and of our heritage and history, the holy words of faith of our fathers. Fascinating!

Could they not have been the invisible beacon that beckoned to their children: "Yes, go forth out of your land, the one that has hosted you and come hither. For in this long and wearisome journey of Galut [Diaspora], your next and final stop must still be Canada. And we, your ancestors, are here already, in order to greet you and to ease your journey."

Points of Suspension makes us remember

By JUSTIN DAHAN

Every year, the University of Ottawa holds an exhibition for students graduating with a bachelor of fine arts. One of the students participating in this year's exhibit was Toba Cooper.

On Campus

Cooper decided, like many artists do, to let her art speak passionately about something that's important to her. She settled on a piece that would remind the world of the horrors of the Holocaust. The result was a compilation of interviews that were shown on four different screens. The project combined audio and still pictures of survivors with video clips of them talking about their personal experiences.

Toba had four child survivors – Fanya Fauner, George Berman, Magda Hilf and Judy Cohen – talk about the cattle cars and how they arrived at Auschwitz. She also had them speak about a moment of humanity they shared in the camps.

The final result was a work that lasted 14 minutes and 25 seconds. Cooper had patrons moving from screen to screen to watch the different stories. She dubbed this fine piece of art Points of Suspension.

Cooper spent a whole year travelling to Montreal and Toronto, as well as around Ottawa, to interview survivors for her piece, all this on top of a heavy course load. She ended up interviewing a total of nine survivors, but she could only include four in her piece.

She spoke about the difficulty of having to select which interviews to include in Points of Suspension. "It was difficult for me to have to choose what material to use from my nine incredible interviews, but I had to base my decisions on my time constraints," she said.

The exhibit was seen by more than 200 people on opening day, with up to 30 people seeing it at a time – very impressive, considering the size of the smallish room in which it was located.

The exhibit also included a sign-in sheet. One of the notes left was by Andrea Fitzpatrick, an assistant professor in U of O's department of visual arts, who wrote, "Congratulations on this amazing, serious, moving, amazing, important work of such humanity and respect."

On a campus where Jewish events have occasionally been met with unwelcome protests, Cooper's piece conveyed an important message without meeting the same reaction. The ability she had to effectively get her message out is an indication of a great artist with a message that cannot be ignored.

Cooper's art not only educated its mostly non-Jewish audience about the Holocaust, it also served as a reminder to Jewish students. One Jewish student wrote in the sign-in book, "I'm Jewish. My great-aunt died in Auschwitz. Her name was Clara and she was 23 years old. Your piece touched my heart. I'm reminded of just how lucky I am."

Points of Suspension had an important impact on everyone who went to see it, both those who have ties to the Holocaust and those who don't. It's a great example of how art can educate and how it's possible to make a difference while doing something you love.

Jewish Life

Avoiding Shabbats of destruction

Class Act
By Daniel Held

Our seders are filled with questions and commentary, insights and discussion. Weeks before Passover, my family begins preparing by reading and studying. Despite our hours of preparation, it was well into our first seder and well past bedtime for my little four-year-old cousin when he made one of the most insightful comments of the night.

Knowing that we don't turn lights on and off during Shabbat or Yom Tov, he said, "If these lights stay on all night, you'll waste a lot of energy."

Al Gore could not have said it better.

In six days, God created the world, and on the seventh, God rested. Our Shabbat is meant to follow God's example by refraining from creative work and retreating into a simpler time of family, community and relaxation. While stepping back from creation, however, our Shabbat practices sometimes fall into the trap of destruction.

In our zeal to observe Shabbat, we sometimes neglect to consider the environmental impact of our actions. Because we can't turn them on and off, we often leave lights and air-conditioning units on throughout Shabbat. Because we don't use the dishwasher, many use disposable dishes.

Shabbat observance and environmental considerations need not be mutually exclusive. By thinking creatively, we can reunite our Shabbat practices with the primal Shabbat of creation (and likely save some money along the way).

I'd like to offer some practical suggestions to help make our Shabbat observance more environmentally conscious.

Use timers. The dining room light doesn't need to be on at 3 a.m., and living room lights may not be needed on a sunny Shabbat afternoon. Installing timers and anticipating when lights need to be on and off can drastically reduce energy consumption. The same can be said for a crock pot and plata (hot plate). Do they need to be on all of Shabbat afternoon, or can a timer turn them off after lunch?

Replacing incandescent light bulbs with compact fluorescents can save a significant amount of energy – especially on lights that stay on throughout Shabbat, such as bathroom lights.

I've been to far too many Shabbat meals that use disposable dishes. While many families don't run their dishwasher on Shabbat, washing dishes by hand or loading the dishwasher and waiting to turn it on after Shabbat offer good alternatives to throwing away plastic plates, cutlery and cups. Similarly, try using cloth napkins that can be laundered rather than paper napkins that need to be thrown away. (My mother tells me they also look much nicer.)

Before Shabbat, make sure that computers are turned off. Similarly, there's no need for a cellphone or laptop to charge throughout Shabbat. Before lighting Shabbat candles, a simple sweep of the house to unplug electronics can have an impact on energy consumption.

Store leftovers in reusable containers. A few plastic containers can save space in the fridge, be heated up in the microwave and washed up quickly to be ready for next week's leftovers.

My four-year-old cousin has grown up with an enviable environmental consciousness. His education has endowed him with an ability to think about the broader impact of his actions – a skill that is still missing in much of our community. At a Yom Ha'atzamut celebration last week, I cringed when soft drinks were served in Styrofoam cups, and when I drive by our communal institutions late at night and see the internal lights left on, I realize how much work needs to be done.

It's time for our community – both in our homes and our institutions – to rethink our environmental policies and find the meeting point between our tradition and the sustainability of our practices.

Rumours and hoaxes, Part 1

Did you just get that e-mail about the company that's decided to boycott Israel? Or did someone message you about what that anti-Semitic actor said? Or did you hear about that politician who trivialized the Holocaust? Actually, those events may never have happened. You may be on the receiving end of an Internet hoax.

I regularly get e-mails warning me not to patronize a certain multinational corporation because it has just adopted some odious policy toward Israel. After a bit of investigating, the rumour often turns out to be just that. Israel and world Jewry have enough real enemies without anyone maligning innocent organizations or individuals. And when you forward something that's not true, you upset friends for nothing and provoke them to fight injustices that simply aren't there. So this week and next, I'll tell you how to check out whether that accusation really is true.

You can spot a hoax in your e-mail in-box even before you read what it has to say. Here are a few tips from the Urban Legends section of About.com.

• Look for the telltale phrase, "Forward this to everyone you know!" The more urgent the plea, the more suspect the message.

• Look for statements such as "this is not a hoax." They typically mean the opposite of what they say.

• Watch for overly emphatic language, as well as frequent use of UPPERCASE LETTERS and multiple exclamation points!!!!!!! [tinyurl.com/hoax01]

OK, once you've discarded those e-mails, you are left with some that seem plausible but you're just not sure. Following are some examples.

• U.S. President Barack Obama authorized funds for the immigration of Hamas refugees to the United States. False. As TruthOrFiction.com clarified, in January 2009, Obama approved an emergency contribution of $20.3 million solely for "urgent relief efforts in the Gaza Strip." [tinyurl.com/hoax03]

• Nike shoes ran an ad showing an apparent suicide bombing in Israel. The text of the ad next to Nike's trademarked Swoosh reads, "You may not survive the blast. But your shoes will." False. The Anti-Defamation League has an entire section on its website geared to debunking rumours and calls the e-mail a forgery. That so-called ad "was not authorized by Nike and has no affiliation with the company." [tinyurl.com/hoax02]

• Actor Angelina Jolie hates the State of Israel and wants its destruction together "with those people." False. I turned to boycottwatch.org to set the record straight on this baseless one. [tinyurl.com/hoax04]

• Iran has passed a law requiring Jews and Christians to wear badges identifying them as religious minorities. False. For this one, I consulted snopes.com, which reprints the original accusation, and explains how it is untrue. [tinyurl.com/hoax05] Snopes has the most comprehensive rumour investigations.

I should point out that snopes.com, truthorfiction.com and boycottwatch.org deal with all types of rumours, such as the one about a Wendy's fast-food outlet patron who found a human finger in her chili. False: the woman pleaded guilty to placing the finger in her food in hopes of a huge settlement. [tinyurl.com/hoax06] However, there seems to be inordinate number of rumours about Israel and Jews out there. You can find them by doing a simple search at those sites.

One more site worth mentioning is Hoaxbusters, which was created by the U.S. government's Department of Energy. This site is no longer being updated, but you can still consult an archived version with sections on the history of hoaxes, the risk and cost of hoaxes and what to do if you receive a hoax letter. [tinyurl.com/hoax07]

Sometimes mistakes occur and the party involved takes responsibility, apologizes and corrects the wrong. Unfortunately, the story often doesn't end there. Angry e-mails fail to take note of the apology. A few years ago, an Israeli-based travel agency received a letter from the Marriott hotel chain designating Jerusalem as an "occupied Palestinian area." E-mails went out calling for a boycott. Mariott corrected the error and acknowledged that it was remiss in not sending a timely letter of apology to the offended Israeli travel agent. But who knows how many accusatory e-mails are still travelling through cyberspace? [tinyurl.com/hoax08]

Keep that in mind before you forward that piece of e-mail!!!!!!

Teen volunteers recognized for helping others

Compiled by CJN Staff

Volunteers aren't paid, not because they're worthless, but because they're priceless, 16-year-old Jonah Babins said at Chabad Youth Network's recent first evening of recognition for the volunteers of Teens For the Community (TFC).

TFC is a group of teenagers whose primary goal is to assist the underprivileged in their local community. They meet weekly throughout the school year to plan and co-ordinate events for the Jewish community and other organizations in the GTA, with special emphasis on children and the elderly.

Their activities have included visits to retirement homes, basketball tournaments to raise money for a widowed mom in the neighbourhood, bowl-a-thons to benefit underprivileged children and a game of laser tag for younger kids.

To help others, TFC volunteers commit to consistency in attendance and participation, regardless of school schedules or extracurricular activities.

The volunteers found that the program gave them self-satisfaction, boosted their self-esteem, developed their leadership skills and fine-tuned their creativity in a practical way, while having simple fun and socializing in a healthy and productive environment.

"Although TFC has given us the opportunity to build necessary skills and learn about the world around us, it has also given members... a chance to make new friends. TFC has a welcoming environment," said recognition evening MC Erica Melamed, a Grade 9 sudent.

At the event, the volunteers were acknowledged by rabbis, parents and friends and member of Parliament Peter Kent presented them with certificates for their volunteerism.

"The volunteers and staff from the TFC program display an unbridled dedication to consistency and commitment. It is truly remarkable that these teens would meet regularly on a weekly basis throughout... the school year, all for the betterment of the greater community," Kent said.

Referring to the future of the group, TFC president Josh Freedman said, "The vision down the road for TFC is to establish different branches all over the community, and to spread our influence to help an ever wider range of people."

TFC operates under the guidance of its founder, Rabbi Shmuli Nachlas of Chabad Youth Network. Rabbi Shmuli, as he is known, also established the Torah for Teens Jewish high school program, offers counseling and guidance to teens on many issues and, along with his wife, Chani, runs CYN Hebrew School for elementary age children.

Ontario Minister of Citizenship and Immigration Michael Chan, left, recently presented the June Callwood Awards for Outstanding Achievement for Voluntarism in Ontario as part of the province's celebration of National Volunteer Week, April 19 to 25. Among the 20 groups and individuals who received honours was Reuben Cipin of Toronto, right, who successfully lobbied for government issued photo identification for people who don't drive.

Activist gets volunteer award for ID card drive

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Local activist Reuben Cipin was one of 20 individuals and groups to receive Ontario's 2009 June Callwood Outstanding Achievement Award for Volunteerism at a ceremony held April 24 at St. Lawrence Hall in Toronto.

Cipin, 81, is visually impaired and volunteers with the Toronto advocacy committee of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind.

The June Callwood Award – named for the late journalist, author and social activist – recognizes exceptional leadership, innovation, creativity among volunteers, and Cipin won the award for his efforts to ensure that individuals who don't drive are able to obtain a government-issued photo identification card.

At the award ceremony, which took place during National Volunteer Week, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration Michael Chan reflected on the "wonderful commitment of our volunteers – and how much we all benefit from them.

"The Government of Ontario believes that volunteerism is a very valuable part of life in Ontario."

In presenting the award, Chan said that the award is for "people who have demonstrated their care and bonding with the tribe of humanity. Ontario is a better place because of all that you have done.".

Cipin was born in Glace Bay, N.S. He attended Acadia University in Wolfville, N.S., and graduated from Osgoode Hall Law School in 1956. He then practised law in Edmonton, but left his firm in 1970, at age 42, after suffering a heart attack.

He worked for the Alberta Justice Department for 22 years. He served as president of Beth Shalom Synagogue and was active with the Edmonton Talmud Torah.

He moved to Toronto in 1997 to follow his five children. He resides at 2 Neptune Drive, which in 2004 was renamed the Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community.

Since 2002, he has served as elected president of the council of the building, which is a Baycrest Property Project Residence.

Monty Mazin, chair of public relations and the program committee at the building, said that "Reuben's perseverance, commitment and dedication to all those who do not drive paid off with the passage of the Ontario Photo Card Act in 2008.

"Reuben is a cherished friend and I can speak on behalf of the entire mishpachah at 2 Neptune when I say that we have one of the most knowledgeable volunteer advocates that any senior residence could wish to have."

JACK GROSSMAN ז"ל

On April 27, 2009 passed away in Toronto with family by his side. Jack was the beloved husband of Hilda for 58 years, a loving father to Sharon & Meir Lazar, Leonard & Sally, Ralph & Risa and Eli & Barbara Grossman. He was a dear brother of Ben Grossman, Martha Sud and Lillian Rose. He will also be deeply missed by his 16 grandchildren and 11 great grandchildren.

As a young man Jack served in the Royal Canadian Airforce as an Aerial Photographer in World War II. Upon returning to Canada he founded what would later become Billy Bee Honey, "Canada's Favourite Honey". As President of Billy Bee his commitment to his job led him through his entire life.

A special thank you to all the nursing staff and doctors at Sunnybrook Hospital for their support and care, and to Oscar David his caregiver, who took special care of Jack during the past 3 years. Memorial donations may be made to Hatzalah, 416-398-2300.

Discourse on Israel and Jews sinks to new low

Criticism of Israel is reaching a state of hysterical overreaction, devoid of rational analysis of events on the ground. Even decent, well-meaning people have been swept up in this frenzy to such a degree that they're now willing to entertain, as legitimate discussion, the most vile caricatures of Israelis and Jews.

That's what happened on May 3, when CBC Radio Sunday Edition devoted its first hour to airing English playwright Caryl Churchill's play Seven Jewish Children.

A 10-minute drama, ostensibly criticizing Israel's military conduct during the recent conflict in Gaza, Seven Jewish Children ends up caricaturing Israelis and demonizing Jews as bloodthirsty murderers of Palestinian children.

Sunday Edition host Michael Enright said it was important to broadcast the play – a series of monologues spoken by Jewish parents about what to tell their children concerning difficult episodes in their history – in order to appreciate the controversy surrounding it. So the CBC Radio audience was treated to lines such as the following, about Israel's military operations in Gaza, which conclude the performance: "Tell her [a Jewish child] we killed the [Palestinian] babies by mistake… Tell her I laughed when I saw the dead [Palestinian] policemen. Tell her they're animals living in rubble now. Tell her I wouldn't care if we wiped them out… Tell her we're better haters. Tell her we're chosen people."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Immediately following the reading of the play, Enright interviewed British novelist Howard Jacobson, who has written scathing critiques of Churchill's work.

Jacobson made several key points:

- Churchill's production is political propaganda masquerading as art;
- It's based on a lie about Israel's actions in Gaza and the way Israelis feel about innocent Palestinian civilians killed or injured in the recent conflict. Churchill eliminated any context about the conflict, making Israelis look wantonly brutal and wholly callous;
- It's also a lie to imply, as Churchill does, that Jews who suffered under the Nazi Holocaust are acting in a similar way toward the Palestinians;
- Churchill promotes an anti-Semitic "blood libel" against Jews, whom she refers to as "chosen people."

Enright next interviewed McGill University professor Abby Lippman, a member of Independent Jewish Voices, a group that's promoting the play's performance in Canada. (It debuted in Montreal this month and will be staged in Toronto May 15 to 17.)

Enright asked Lippman whether she thought the play is anti-Semitic. "No, I do not. I reject that label," she said, without substantial elaboration.

With respect to Jacobson's charge that Churchill promoted a "blood libel," Enright referred to a line that he admitted he found "curiously disturbing": "Tell her we killed the babies by mistake."

Enright asked: "Isn't the inference in that line that Israelis were killing babies on purpose?" Lippman said that she didn't read it that way, but is aware that some have, adding, "It may be that I'm just not sophisticated enough or religious enough" to see any blood libel. Instead, she said, all she saw in that line was anger about Israel's conduct in Gaza.

Referring to another point that Jacobson made, namely, that not all criticism of Israel is anti-Semitic, Enright pressed on with Lippman, asking, "But isn't it also the case that sometimes anti-Semitism is hiding in the cloak of criticism of Israel?" Lippman replied that she won't be silenced by that charge.

While Enright was very conscious of the criticism that Churchill's play is anti-Semitic, even acknowledging that the play is "radioactive," he apparently sided with Lippman against Jacobson on this crucial point. For otherwise he would not have aired something he knew or believed to contain noxious anti-Semitic tropes. And this is something this columnist, who knows and respects Enright, accepts that he would not knowingly do.

Yet it's also indisputable that Jacobson has the correct reading of the Churchill text, even if certain individuals, including some Jews themselves, fail or refuse, for whatever reason, to recognize this.

The result is that the CBC broadcast something, however unwittingly, that promotes some of the most historically vile stereotypes about Jews. Sunday Edition must deal with the consequences of its failure to acknowledge what is really at issue here.

This also stands as a frightening indication of how previously unacceptable discourse is becoming mainstream in the media.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

St. Louis passenger recalls ill-fated voyage

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Eighty-three-year-old survivor Herbert Karliner was one of 936 German Jews who tried to flee Hilter's persecution by boarding the ill-fated St. Louis ship that sailed away out of Germany toward freedom in America.

Herbert Karliner

Karliner and the other passengers had paid their passage and had their quota numbers for entry into the United States. They were to arrive first in Cuba, and stay there while waiting for their numbers to come up for entry into America. The tragic story of the passengers of this ship was one Hollywood retold in 1976 in the movie Voyage of the Damned.

"We were in the Cuban harbour for one week. The Cuban police stopped us from disembarking. The first Spanish word I learned was manyana [tomorrow], but manyana never came. We were turned away by the Cubans and cruised around to Miami. We sent telegrams to [then U.S. president Franklin D.] Roosevelt to let us in, and then we sent a telegram to Eleanor Roosevelt asking her to let in even just the children. But we didn't get an answer. We sent telegrams to South America and Canada [which went unanswered]. Nobody wanted us," Karliner said in an interview with The CJN.

He was in Winnipeg as part of a Canada-Israel Friendship Tour sponsored by Watchmen for the Nations and other Christian groups last month.

"I was 12-1/2 years old and I could see Miami from the ship, and I was so impressed with it I knew I wanted to live there," Karliner recalled.

The Jews on the ship were finally granted entry into various countries, including France, Holland, Belgium and England, but as the Nazis overtook Europe, more than a third of them were killed.

"I came to France, and one year later we were occupied by Germans. On Aug. 26, 1942, I was arrested and taken by the Germans to a camp. All of the boys over 16 were taken to Auschwitz. I was very lucky. It was one week before my 16th birthday and they let me go," Karliner said.

His sisters and parents "were arrested and taken to Auschwitz and never came back."

A French Jewish humanitarian organization, the Oeuvre de Secours aux Enfants (OSE), offered Karliner "false papers," and he boarded a ship "to go to Spain and then to Palestine." But he never got to Palestine.

"After arriving in Spain, I was caught and sent back to France. Then the OSE gave me money to go to Switzerland, but when I got there I was arrested and sent back to France… and finally the organization [OSE] placed me in a village in France, where they [the villagers] didn't know I was Jewish or German. My papers showed I was born in Alsace-Lorraine. The farmer [I lived with] didn't know I was Jewish. I went to church and worked like a slave, but at least I had a roof over my head and something to eat," Karliner recalled.

After being liberated by the U.S. Army in 1944, he reconnected with OSE, and through it he was sent to a displaced persons' camp in France, along with 450 Jewish boys who had survived Buchenwald.

"Elie Wiesel was one of those boys. [Israeli] Chief Rabbi [Yisrael Meir] Lau was one of those boys," Karliner said.

He finally made his way to the United States in 1946 and headed straight for Miami Beach.

"In 1950, I got a letter from Uncle Sam saying, 'I want you.' In 1939, Uncle Sam didn't want me, but in 1950 I was drafted into the American army and sent out East [serving as a translator in the Pacific]," Karliner said.

A retired baker, he is married to a woman he met in a children's home in France. They have two daughters and three grandchildren.

Did you know singing is good for your health?

Singing has been found to have many benefits including burning calories, improving lung capacity, enhancing posture, and even helping cope with stress.

Young leaders gather in Toronto

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

About 160 young Jewish leaders from across Canada gathered at the Sheraton Centre in Toronto last weekend for the Flick the Switch conference to develop Jewish leadership skills and to "shrink the country."

Steven Farber, 34, chair of UIA Federations Canada National Young Leadership Executive, which hosted the conference with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said working with Jewish leaders from all over the country will strengthen the Jewish community as a whole.

"What we're trying to do is not only shrink the country, but to a certain extent we're trying to shrink the world and ensure that the dialogue is working to strengthen the communities around the world," said Farber, who works for National Bank Financial Inc., and has been volunteering with Jewish organizations for eight years.

Steven Farber

"Let us each benefit from each others' good ideas. Let us each benefit from each others' challenges. Where there are opportunities to do things together as communities… let's do it."

The keynote speaker for the event, Marc Kielburger, CEO of Free the Children, delivered an address titled "Me to We: Achieving True Well-Being through Social Involvement."

Farber, who spoke to The CJN just days before the conference kicked off on May 8, said an event such as Flick the Switch allows people to learn from each other and to discover how much they have in common.

"We're very proud that it is a very inclusive conference of all communities from coast to coast, and I think they're coming together to make new friendships, to rekindle old friendships, to learn about different ideas that are working in other parts of the country that can be applied, or modified and subsequently applied," said the Ottawa native.

He said one of the challenges that Jewish communities in all parts of the world face, is engaging the next generation to become involved.

"Everybody realizes the importance, but the tough part is how you do it," Farber said.

"The only way you can do things is to constantly have dialogue and you get feedback and you try different things and you keep speaking about what is working and what's not and try very hard to strengthen the various communities."

But, he added, the conference isn't all serious business.

"It's a young leadership conference, which means there are a lot of laughs, there's a lot of learning and there is always a high level of energy."

Farber, a UJA Federation board member who has held leadership roles with a number of other Jewish organizations, including Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee, said he grew up in a family who was always involved in the community.

"I find myself in a weird position now because… at the same time that I've taken over as chair of the National Young Leadership… my mother is actually the president of UIA, Barbara Farber," he said.

Farber added that being active in the Jewish community has afforded him many opportunities to travel, make meaningful friendships with peopleall over the world, and he encourages Jewish youth to get involved in whatever way they can.

סרטים שחובה

עבר זמן מאז שהמלצתי לכם לאחרונה על סרטים, ומאחר ואנחנו רואים שלושה סרטים בשבוע-זוהי התנהגות בלתי חברתית, אז הינה מקבץ חובה:

סוף סוף הגיע לטורונטו עץ הלימון הנפלא, הוא זוכה לתשבוחות רבות של הביקורת הקנדית. זהו סיפורה של אשה פלשתינאית שמגדלת על גבול גדר ההפרדה את פרדס הלימונים המשפחתי, שמועבר מדור לדור שנים רבות. בניה מזבו זה מכבר את הארץ והיא בעקשנות אינה מוכנה לוותר. ואז יום אחד מחליט שר הבטחון הישראלי לעבור לגור בישוב ששכן לגדר ההפרדה, והשב"כ מחליט שהפרדס מסכן את חיי שר הבטחון ומשפחתו. ואז מתפתח סיפור מרתק ונוגע ללב, שמציג גם את הצד הישראלי וגם את הפלשתינאי באור מגוחך. מעבר לעלילה המרתקת ולבצוע המושלם-היו לי דמעות גאווה על שארצי, ארץ דמוקרטית, מאפשרת לסרט כזה להיעשות ואף לקבל תמיכה ממשלתית. לי זה היה חשוב אפילו יותר מהסרט עצמו, כי זה היה מבחן של חוסן ביטוי ודמוקרטיה במדינה שנלחמת על קיומה נגד הטרור הכי מתועב שיש. עשר בסולם קורן.

Three Monkeys הוא סרט טורקי שעוסק בפוליטיקאי מצליח שהיה מעורב בתאונה קטלנית, הוא מבקש מנהגו הצייות ן (שלא היה איתו בליל התאונה) שירדה באשמה. הנהג יושב בכלא תשעה חדשים, שבהם תומך הפוליטיקאי במשפחתו, אבל גם מפתח יחסים אינטימיים עם אשת האסיר. לא אגלה לכם יותר מן העלילה, רק אומר שזה סרט מדהים גם בעלילתו וגם בדיאלוגים ובחשיבה העמוקה שבו. עוד עשר בסולם קורן.

Hunger הוא סיפור אמיתי של אסיר מהמחתרת האירית שמחליט לשבות רעב בכלא הבריטי. זהו סרט עז ונוקב על אירגלד של שנות מלחמת האזרחים. זהו סרט בכורה מדהים של במאי בריטי צעיר סטיב מקווין (לא קשור לשחקן המנוח). צריך לסרט הזה קיבה חזקה, אבל מעבר לזה-הסרט הוא חווית בידרה. עשר שלישי בסולם קורן. אני לא חושב שאי פעם נתתי שלוש עשיריות בטור אחד, אבל מה לעשות-כל אחד מהם שווה את זמנכם ואת תשומת לבכם. אבל שישאר בינינו.

אופטימיות בת ששים ואחת

עקבתי בעניין רב אחרי הכתבות של עיתוני יום העצמאות ואחרי השידורים השונים, ומעבר לתגיגות הטבעית של יום העצמאות-בלטה מאוד אופטימיות גדולה על מצב האומה מצד כותבים רבים, בניהם כאלה שלא חוסכים שבטם לאורך השנה.

הנעתי למסקנות הבאות:

העם בישראל מרגיש חזק, ומאמין שיהיה טוב, לא משנה מי ינהיג אותו: נתניהו, לבני, ברק-כולם נסף קטן, כולם יעשו מחות או יותר את אותו דבר-בהגנה, בכלכלה, בחינוך, אבל מי שבאמת מזיז את הסוס קדימה זה הסוס עצמו- שבעה מליון אזרחים דינאמיים, שאפתנים, סקרנים, ציניים אבל אכפתיים, והם יודעים שיהיה בסדר. הם אומרים, כל אחד בדרכו שלו: תראו לנו עוד מדינה שהשיגה כל כך הרבה בזמן כל כך קצר בנסיבות כל כך עוינות.

מה להגיד לכם-הרגשתי גאווה עמוקה בעם שלי. כמו שאמר אמיר גלבוע, בשיר שהלחנתי עם שלמה ארצי:

"פתאום קם אדם בבוקר ומרגיש שהוא עם ומתחיל ללכת".

תערוכת האמנים הישראלים 2009

בטורונטו פועלת זה שנים רבות קבוצה של אמנים ישראלים. ביום חמישי, 21 במאי, תיפתח תערוכה שלהם בת'ורנהיל, ותכלול ציור, פיסול, קדירות,טקסטיל, צורפות וצילום. לדעתי, מהכרה של כמה מהאמנים-זו הולכת להיות חוויה מיוחדת, שחבל להחמיץ. ואלה האמנים שלנו. התערוכה תתרץ בסופשבוע של ה-22 עד ה 24

Winnipeg camp waives fees for new immigrant kids

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Camp Massad has done something that appears to be unprecedented in the history of Winnipeg's Jewish community: the Hebrew immersion overnight camp is offering 17 immigrant children a free two weeks of camp in its first session this July.

"The only criteria is that all of the children must have settled in Winnipeg within the last five years and must be attending Massad for the first time," said Leslie Jacobs, administrative director of Camp Massad, located in Winnipeg Beach on Lake Winnipeg.

"We've been able to do this as a result of receiving a $20,000 grant from the Dorothea Gould Foundation, a Swiss-based foundation. We were made aware of this foundation and encouraged to apply by Faye Rosenberg-Cohen [the planning director] of the Jewish Federation [of Winnipeg]," Jacobs said.

Rosenberg-Cohen said the vast majority of Jewish immigrants to Winnipeg in the last couple of years have been Russian Israelis.

"All of these new immigrant children speak fluent Hebrew, since they've lived in Israel. They are a really good fit for our camp. They are easily able to participate in our drama productions that are put on in Hebrew. They are natural stars… And they are real assets to the camp, because they help raise the level of Hebrew," Jacobs said.

A request for proposals written by the Dorothea Gould Foundation says the foundation is aware of research "that confirms that an intensive summer… overnight Jewish oriented camp experience has positive long-term impact on youth," and keeps them connected to Jewish life.

Jacobs said Camp Massad decided to offer the spots free of charge, since even if there are subsidies available to go to camp, "there are always some people who are reluctant to apply for subsidies, which requires having to show financial need… We wanted new immigrant children to have the opportunity of experiencing Jewish camping without having to worry about having to go through the process of qualifying for subsidies."

Some immigrant families to Winnipeg have had more trouble than they originally anticipated re-settling in the city.

"A lot of them have to re-educate, and the economy is in a downturn, so the resettlement process can take time," Jacobs said.

Camp Massad advertised its 17 positions via e-mail with the assistance of the federation and Winnipeg's Jewish Child & Family Service.

"Within a week and a half, all of the spots were filled," Jacobs said.

The immigrant children will all be attending the camp's first session, because that's when Massad had room to accommodate them.

"We only have 60 children registered for first session, including the 17 spots that the grant covers. Second session usually fills up, and we have close to 120 campers," she said.

Camp Massad is one of only two Jewish camps in Canada that are Hebrew-speaking, Jacobs said.

Last year, Massad received a grant of $5,000 from the Dorothea Gould Foundation, which went toward subsidies for children in need.

"So far, we haven't had other families of immigrant children, in addition to the 17 families, apply to get a spot free of charge. But if someone expresses an interest in our a camp, they'll still be able to apply for a subsidy from us, or they also can apply to the province-wide Sun-Shine fund, which assists kids who want to go to camp," Jacobs said.

Garment mogul to be feted at JNF gala

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG —This is turning out to be a banner year for Winnipeg business leader Bob Silver.

On July 1, Silver will become the seventh chancellor of the University of Winnipeg, and about a month earlier – on June 8 – he'll be front and centre as the 2009 Jewish National Fund Negev Gala honoree.

Bob Silver

"I am humbled to be included in the company of a long list of previous worthy recipients of this honour, including a couple of Manitoba premiers," Silver said.

"We are delighted that Bob agreed to be our honoree this year," says Mel Lazareck, himself a former JNF Negev Gala honoree (along with his wife, Karen). "He has done so much over the years for both the Jewish and general community. Everyone is excited about having Bob as our honoree."

It has been quite an interesting journey for Silver from a communal farm in British Columbia to the top echelon of Winnipeg business and community leadership.

Born and raised in Winnipeg, the young Silver, like many of his contemporaries in the late 1960s and early '70s, left home after university to join the counterculture.

He was lured back to Winnipeg in 1973 by his uncle, S.J. Nitikman, who needed help in managing the family business. Western Glove Works was a longstanding Winnipeg-based garment manufacturer specializing in jeans. (The company originally made gloves.)

Silver expected to be working with his uncle for just a few months before returning to the farm. Thirty-six years later, he's still here. And as president of Western Glove Works, he has helped make the company one of the top jean manufacturers in the world and take denim into the realm of high fashion.

Silver and his longtime business partner, Ron Stern, also own Warehouse One, a chain of denim wear retail outlets, as well as the Winnipeg Free Press and Brandon Sun daily newspapers.

Over the years, Silver has played a leading role in the garment industry here and across Canada. In more recent years, he has become involved with a number of volunteer organizations. He chaired last year's local United Way campaign, for example, and he's also co-chaired the Premier's Economic Advisory Council and the Winnipeg Library Foundation.

In the Jewish community, he was the founding chair of Grow Winnipeg, the community's five-year-old campaign to increase the Jewish population here through a combination of retention programs aimed at younger people and recruitment efforts directed to former Winnipeggers and potential newcomers.

Lazareck said Stern and Hartley Richardson, a scion of Winnipeg's long-established business family of the same name, have agreed to co-chair the gala evening this year.

"We are hoping to sell out the Centennial Concert Hall [which seats about 1,800]," Lazareck says.

Funds raised from every Negev Gala help support a project in Israel. This year's project is the establishment of an ecologically friendly wastewater treatment facility on Kibbutz Ne'ot Semadar in southern Israel.

"We expect that this first-of-its-kind wastewater treatment facility will be a model for others around the world," said Jacqueline Freedman, JNF's development co-ordinator for Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

The project fits in with ongoing joint water research being concluded between Manitoba and Israeli water experts, thanks to an agreement forged between the JNF and the government of Manitoba two years ago.

Entertainment at this year's gala will be Tararam, an Israeli stomp group.

Montreal Jewish leader retires from Senate

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Yoine Goldstein spent his last day in the Senate May 7, having reached the mandatory retirement age of 75.

Goldstein, a Montreal lawyer and longtime Jewish community leader, was appointed to the upper chamber in August 2005 by former prime minister Paul Martin.

Goldstein was the latest in a long line of Jewish senators from Quebec, all Liberals, going back to the appointment of the late Lazarus Phillips in 1968 and, in more recent decades, including Sheila Finestone and Leo Kolber.

As Goldstein said himself, he was not simply a senator who happened to be Jewish, but considered himself a representative of the Jewish community's interests, whether it was commemorating events like Yom Hashoah or Yom Hazikaron or speaking out against anti-Semitism or unfair criticism of Israel. Goldstein said he would like to see another Jewish senator continue in that role.

Unlike when Kolber's seat was about to become vacant in January 2004 after 20 years, few names have been touted as possible successors to Goldstein. Among those that have been proposed, however, are lawyers and brothers Robert and Michael Vineberg, sons of the late Philip Vineberg, Lazarus Phillips' law partner. Goldstein believes they would be splendid choices.

There are now three Jews in the Senate: Conservatives Hugh Segal and Irving Gerstein of Ontario, and Liberal Jerry Grafstein of Toronto, who must retire by the beginning of next year.

During his term, Goldstein clashed a few times with Senator Marcel Prud'homme, a former longtime Liberal MP and an outspoken supporter of the Palestinian cause and an opponent of Zionism.

The most recent confrontation was in March, when Prud'homme accused Israel of leaving behind more than a million cluster bombs during its war with Hezbollah in Lebanon in 2006, which he claimed are killing and injuring innocent Lebanese civilians on an almost daily basis, as well as other anti-personnel bombs from its earlier incursions into Lebanon.

He further maintained that Israel is refusing to provide Lebanon with maps indicating the bombs' locations.

Goldstein shot back that Prud'homme was engaging in "misinformation" that is "a figment of someone's over-active imagination…

"In fact… UN commissioner Jan Egeland has long since identified and sequestered 359 sites where the disarming of cluster bombs continues to take place."

No Lebanese are being harmed by the bombs, Goldstein continued, "since all the sites have been identified, and these bombs are being disarmed and secured in sequestered areas."

Goldstein questioned Prud'homme's claim that most of the cluster bombs were dropped during the last two days of the 2006 conflict. "There is no way to verify that assertion," he said.

Goldstein also noted that Prud'homme expressed no sympathy for Israeli victims of that war. Hezbollah, he said, fired dozens of rockets in the direction of Israeli civilians.

He asserted that such "selective sympathy… declares that some people's lives are less important and less significant than other people's lives."

"I let him have it," Goldstein said in an interview last week.

Goldstein leaves the Senate convinced of the continuing value of its traditional role as the chamber of "sober second thought" on legislation passed in the House of Commons and as a check on any abuse of power.

There has been plenty of that under Stephen Harper, Goldstein said.

"He runs the government like a dictatorship, on fear; he's the king and only what he says is OK," Goldstein said.

He was prepared to defend the honour of the institution and the people who serve in it. In another testy exchange last year, not related to the Middle East, Goldstein took to task fellow Quebec Senator Michael Fortier – a Conservative – for belittling the Senate on the popular Radio-Canada television show Tout le Monde en Parle.

Fortier, who also sat in the Harper cabinet, alleged that the senators, including himself, got appointed not for what they know, but for who they know, and are getting well paid for not putting much time or contributing much in the way of wisdom or independent thinking.

Yoine Goldstein

Goldstein described the comments as "insulting and offensive.

"The outstanding Canadians serving here are not serving because they are party hacks. They are serving because they want to serve the country… Many of us work one hell of a lot and we are not paid what we were paid in the private sector. We are here because we want to do something for our country."

The priorities Goldstein set for his time in office were to amend the bankruptcy act to better protect workers and students; to secure more support for financial literacy programs; to enact a law to control spam e-mail; and to urge greater Canadian action to stop the conflict in Darfur.

He was vice-chair of the banking committee and co-founded the all-party parliamentary group against genocide. Goldstein also supported the release of Canadian citizen Omar Khadr from Guantanamo Bay.

Goldstein left reluctantly. "I was delighted to be there and feel very privileged to have been part of the government."

Goldstein was a high-powered bankruptcy lawyer in Goldstein, Flanz & Fishman when he ascended to the Senate almost four years ago. He is returning to the practice of law with the firm McMillan.

He will receive an honorary doctorate from Yeshiva University on June 15 at a convocation and dinner at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, along with Supreme Court Justice Morris Fish and Rabbi Howard Joseph of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue.

Medjuck, Zatzman get N.S. business award

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Two men responsible for changing the faces of their respective Nova Scotia communities are to be inducted into the Junior Achievement Nova Scotia Business Hall of Fame June 16.

Developer Ralph Medjuck, 75, of Halifax altered the city's skyline in the 1960s and continues to revamp its face today with new downtown development. He built many city office and apartment buildings, hotels and senior citizens residences.

The late Joseph Zatzman, former mayor of Halifax's sister city, Dartmouth, led the drive for the first major industrial park in the region, spearheaded a second bridge crossing between the two major cities and built new schools, a police station and City Hall. He also operated one of the largest property management companies in the province.

Medjuck, a graduate of Dalhousie University Law School, was honoured by the university with a doctor of law in 2006 for his work and contributions to the community and development professions. Outside Nova Scotia, he did construction and development in the Atlantic region, as well as in Edmonton and downtown Toronto, where he completed the Yonge Richmond Centre and the Cambridge Suites Hotel.

Medjuck, a member of Beth Israel Synagogue, has served as director of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, as well as chairman of the Canadian Jewish Congress' Atlantic region, United Jewish Appeal, Camp Kadimah and State of Israel Bonds in Halifax.

In the wider community, Medjuck has served as chairman of the Neptune Theatre Foundation, as director of the Canadian Mental Health Association and the Nova Scotia Human Rights Foundation, and as a council member of the Halifax Board of Trade. He received the Queen's Jubilee Medal and the Tourism Industry Association of Nova Scotia's Tourism Vision Award.

"My personal effort hasn't so much been to build better buildings as it has been to build better people as well. I want to see everyone develop to their full potential. That's what made our company successful and this region a great place to work in," he says

As mayor of Dartmouth in the late 1960s, Zatzman's leadership and "get-things-done" attitude created an image of a man of integrity and strength whose vision led to a prosperous community and province.

Beginning in 1934 with a small Dartmouth grocery shop, Zatzman eventually entered property development and management. His Maplehurst Properties company became one of the largest property management companies in Nova Scotia.

After his two terms as mayor in the late 1960s, he became chairman of the Nova Scotia Resources Development Board, where he was instrumental in rescuing Nova Scotia's fishing industry from financial ruin.

In the 1980s, Zatzman headed the Business Development Corporation. He was given an honorary doctorate of law from Saint Mary's University in 1979, was awarded the 125th Anniversary of the Confederation of Canada medal and was named to the Order of Canada in 1997.

Additionally, he served as chairman of the United Jewish Appeal and the local Israel Bonds committee, was a governor of Saint Mary's University, vice-president of the Nova Scotia Liberal Association, and a director of the Victorian Order of Nurses and Kiwanis Club.

His son, Michael, says his father, who died in 2006 at age 95, was concerned with "improving local business, making a fair living and putting food on the table. He had no interest in being a huge success. He just wanted to serve the public, work for the underdog and even the playing field for everyone. He was always extremely fair in all his dealings. What I learned from him was to give back. You owe a debt to the community in which you are successful."

Since 1993, 56 people have been inducted into the Junior Achievement Nova Scotia Business Hall of Fame.

UWO houses survivor testimonies

By NICOLE LAIDLER
Special to The CJN

Holocaust denier Ernst Zündel might be surprised to learn that his 1988 criminal trial for spreading false news was the catalyst for what is now one of the world's largest collections of survivor testimonials.

As a member of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, University of Western Ontario French professor Dr. Alain Goldschläger was brought in to help the prosecution research team.

"I quickly realized how important testimonials were, because historians couldn't be part of the court proceedings. History is hearsay," he explained. "It was the survivors who were the substance of the prosecution."

Dr. Alain Goldschläger

But when Goldschläger wanted to look at a bibliography of Holocaust testimonials, he discovered there weren't any. And so he began his quest to systematically collect and catalogue survivors' stories.

Today, Goldschläger's Holocaust Literature Research Institute is the second-largest collection of testimonials outside of Israel. More than 4,000 books written in 29 languages take up most of his UWO office, and Goldschläger has done his best to read them all.

There are wartime journals published by clandestine presses, books written in Yiddish in postwar Buenos Aires and even an account of the Shanghai ghetto told in Chinese.

"Right from the beginning, Jews had the consciousness that this was something of a new magnitude, and they had to record it," Goldschläger said.

Wartime documents provide a detailed record of day-to-day life in Nazi Europe, but offer no larger perspective or explanation.

As time passed, the nature of the testimonials began to change. In fact, Goldschläger has defined five distinct periods of writing.

The majority of Holocaust memoirs come from the second period (1945 to 1951).

"These stories are an outburst – a crie de coeur," Goldschläger said. "It's a disorganized narrative, with little outside perspective."

Production dropped dramatically between 1952 and 1979, although this period saw the mass publication of famous memoirs such as Elie Wiesel's Night and Primo Levi's If This is a Man.

After 1980, survivors realized that their stories might be lost if they were not recorded.

"This fourth period is a reaction to the negation of the revisionists. Suddenly a lot of survivors said, 'It cannot be denied, I have to give my testimony,'" Goldschläger explained.

These memoirs often take a somewhat pedagogical approach as survivors write for children and grandchildren who may have limited knowledge about the war.

"The perspective is also very different," Goldschläger observed. "It's about what a human being can survive and how they can rebuild their lives. They are very positive to a certain extent, because the outcome is positive."

Goldschläger believes the time of true testimonial ended in 2000. Since then, he said, most memoirs have been collaborative efforts or produced in special writing workshops.

"People think once they publish a book, their memories are safe. But if it's only 200 copies distributed to family and friends, it can be lost," he said.

That's what drives him to scour second-hand bookstores and online booksellers for new additions to his collection.

"You can study and learn a lot through historical textbooks, but there are things, small personal events, that can only be found in testimony," he said.

So would someone such as Zündel be swayed by the sheer number of survivors' stories on Goldschläger's shelves?

"No, you will never convince Zündel," Goldschläger said with a sad smile. "But what we can do is stop revisionism from spreading."

Goldwasser's widow tells her story at JUMP

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Most of us know the story quite well.

On July 12, 2006, Israeli Defence Force soldiers Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser were kidnapped by Hezbollah, triggering the Second Lebanon War.

The war lasted about a month, but Karnit Goldwasser spent two years fighting to bring her late husband, whom she affectionately called Udi, and his colleague, Regev, back home.

Goldwasser, who was in Toronto last week to promote a film at the Hot Docs festival called Chronicle of a Kidnap – a documentary that follows Goldwasser on her media campaign to generate international pressure on the Israeli government to negotiate the release of her husband – spoke to an overflow crowd at the Jewish Urban Meeting Place in Thornhill on May 2 about her experience.

She recalled the day her husband and Regev were kidnapped – it was the last day of their month-long reserve duty and she was anticipating her husband's return.

But then news began to trickle in that there was an attack on the Lebanese-Israeli border, right where he was stationed.

"They said several soldiers were killed, others were injured and two were kidnapped, and they didn't know if my husband was among the two kidnapped soldiers or among the casualties," said Goldwasser, who also spoke at York University in the Hillel lounge the following day.

After hours of uncertainty, she, her friends and family heard on the news that Goldwasser was not among the casualties.

"Everyone started to hug and to kiss. We were the happiest family in Israel, I think. If you're thinking about the reason, it's because Udi was kidnapped and it's because the whole day we thought that Udi might be dead, and by the end of the day we got the information that he was not."

It was two years later – when the bodies of Goldwasser and Regev were brought back to be buried in Israel as a result of a prisoner swap with Hezbollah – that she learned with the rest of the world that the two men were most likely killed in the initial attack.

But in the days following the kidnapping, with a hope that her husband was alive and in captivity, she vowed she would do everything in her power to bring him home.

Goldwasser also promised the Regev family and the family of Gilad Schalit – the soldier who had been kidnapped two weeks earlier by Hamas and who is still in captivity – that she would campaign for the safe return of those soldiers as well.

She said that after the war, when the United Nations appointed a negotiator to have the soldiers released, Goldwasser decided to try to meet with as many leaders of the free world as she could in the hope they would work to bring the men home.

But more than anything, she longed for a simple answer to a difficult question.

"I wanted to know if my husband was alive or dead," she said.

"I met many people from the Red Cross, but no one had the ability to give me an answer… The information about whether Udi was alive or dead I received with you, when it was broadcast live on the television."

Goldwasser recalled asking the secretary general of the International Red Cross if she would send a representative to see the two men.

"She said she couldn't do it, because she could not risk [alienating] Hezbollah. This is the Red Cross that I know, and we [Israelis] pay for them."

With Schalit having been in captivity for nearly three years, Goldwasser reminded the gathering that it's important for the international community to work to keep the issue on the agenda.

"By signing petitions and speaking out, they can urge those in power to bring Schalit back home," she said. "When I met Ehud Olmert [Israel's former prime minister], I told him, 'This is not my private problem. It is a problem of Israel and it is a problem of the free world.' He said, 'I know, because I have petitions and I have letters from all over the world that remind me of this issue.'"

She said both Schalit and his family continue to suffer.

"As far as I know from people who have once been in captivity, you cannot see the [day]light and you can count your days by counting the meals, but they change the meals [to confuse you]… We don't know when Gilad had his last shower, or when he's going to have his next one," she said.

"Think about his parents, if someday, someone will come to them to tell them, 'I saw your son.' And think about Gilad Schalit, if someone one day will go to meet him and say, 'From here, I'm going to your parents, and I'm going to tell them that you're OK.'"

Goldwasser said that despite the tragic outcome of her husband's kidnapping, she is proud of her country.

"The bottom line is that after two years… Ehud Olmert decided to bring back Udi and Eldad, and because of this I'm proud of what he did," she said.

"I wasn't abandoned by my country. It wasn't easy… but in the end, Udi was brought back… This is why I'm proud of my country. Because they could have abandoned me."
